A FAMILY NEWSPAPER, DEVOTED TO LITERATURE, SCIENCE, MORALITY, NEWS, AGRICULTURE AND AMUSEMENT.

Vol. XV. PHILADELPHIA, JULY 2, 1836. Whole No. 779.

Central Nave of St. Peter's—Rome.

The interior of this wonderful church is, as the whole, as grand and beautiful as the exterior, though, like that, not free from architectural defects.

It is not, however, when the stranger first crosses the threshhold of its grand gate that the full majesty of the place bursts upon him, but it is by degrees, and after repeated visits that he is made sensible of its size and matchless sublimity. All who have written on the subject agree in this impression. The various parts of this vast church are so well proportioned to each other, every thing being on the same scale of greatness, that the eye is deceived by the harmony which exists, and can only judge of the real size of particular objects, by comparing something in the edifice within reach with something analogous to it in the ordinary works of nature. Thus two figures of cherubs, supporting the vase of holy water over the door, which are six feet high, do not look bigger than children of five years age; nor are their dimensions known but by referring to some lesser man or woman who may be standing near them. And again, the figures of the Evangelists, which decorate the inside of the cupola, do not appear larger than life, though the pen in St. Mark's hand is six feet long. Something also may be found to account for this impression in the elegant notion of Madame de Stael, who fancies the objectivate not so much diminished as the spectator's faculties are raised and aggrandized when he finds himself for the first time within the sacred precinct; and some weight, moreover, must be given to the remark of the acute Forsyth, who says, "Time," and Ancona "but I am a sheep, and as much rice as you have there, before I proceed on my journey. I am, consequently, not hungry; but I will take a little, lest I offend your hospitality." "I must boil it for you," said the dame; "you do not eat grain and meat raw, as we do. Here is a kettle," said he, taking one from among the plundered property. "I will go and get wood for a fire, while you fetch water with the pitcher, pointing to a bag made of the skin of a goat." "Ancona wasted to the saw his best leave the cave for the wood; and then, with great difficulty, he dragged the enormous bag to the bank of a dark stream that passed by the rocks at the other end of the cavern, and after being visible for a few yards, disappeared under ground.

"How shall I, thought Ancona, prevent my weakness being discovered? This bag I could hardly manage when empty; when full it would require twenty strong men to carry it;—what shall I do? I shall sit down and wait for the return of the Ghoul, who is now only kept in order by the impression of my great strength. After some minutes' reflection, the Israelite thought of a scheme, and began digging a small channel from the stream towards the place where the supper was preparing.

"What are you doing?" vociferated the Ghoul, as he advanced towards him; "I sent you for water to cool a little meat, and you have been two hours!—Cannot you fill the bag and bring it away? 'Certainly I can, said Ancona; 'if I were content, after all your kindness to me, to be drowned in the attempt.' 'Drowned!' said the Ghoul, turning pale at the idea of losing a bag large enough to hold it,' said he, pointing to the channel he had begun, 'here, as the experiment shows, is a work in which the hand of man is employed to lessen the labour of the body. This canal, small as it may appear, will carry a stream to the other end of the cave, in which I will construct a dam that you can open and shut at pleasure, and thereby save yourself infinite trouble in fetching water; but pray let me alone till it is finished,—and he began to dig. 'Nonsense!' said the Ghoul, 'I can do that; and filling it; 'I will carry the water myself; and I advise you to leave off your canal, as you call it, and follow me, that you may eat your supper.' 'I will follow you as soon as I have finished the work, if you like it, to-morrow morning.'

"Ancona congratulated himself on this escape, and was slow in taking the advice of his host. After having eaten heartily of the supper that was prepared, he went to repose on a bed made of too richest coverlets and pillows, which, with the other parts of the room, consisted of plundered goods. The Ghoul, whose bed was also in the cave, had no sooner laid down than he fell into a sound sleep. The anxiety of Ancona's mind prevented him from following his example, and he rose gently, and having stuffed a long pillow into the middle of his bed, to make it appear as if he were still there, he retired to a concealed place in the cavern to watch the motions of the Ghoul. The latter awoke a short time before daylight, and rising went, without making any noise, towards Ancona's bed, where not observing the least stir, he was satisfied his guest was still there, and he took up one of his walking sticks, which was in size like the trunk of a tree, and struck a terrible blow at what he supposed to be Ancona's head. He then left the cave, and returned to his gang, who had deprived him of life; but to make sure of his work, he repeated the blow seven times. He then returned to rest, but had hardly settled himself to sleep, when he heard a voice into bed, raised his head above the clothes and exclaimed, 'Friend Ghoul what insect could it be that has disturbed me by its tapping? I counted the flap of its little wing seven times on the wooden pillow before I could get to sleep.' 'Ancona! the voice in the cave, 'I shall never be so wounded, he thought, 'as I have been this night.' Ancona then rose, and fled from the cave, leaving Israhmee its sole master.

When Ancona found his host gone, he was at no loss to conjecture the cause, and immediately began to survey the treasure with which he was surrounded, and to contrive means for removing them to his own home.

After examining the contents of the cave, and arming himself with a match-lock, which had belonged to some victim of the Ghoul, he proceeded to survey the road. He had, however, only gone a short distance, when he saw the Ghoul returning with a large club in his hand, and accompanied by a fox.—Ancona's knowledge of the cunning animal instantly led him to suspect that it had undeceived his enemy, but his presence of mind did not forsake him. "Take that," said he to the fox, aiming a ball at him from his match-lock, and shooting him through the head; "take that for not performing my orders. That brute," said he, "promised to bring me seven Ghools, that I might chain them and bring them to Israhmee; and here he has only brought you, who are already my slave." So saying, he advanced towards the Ghoul; but the latter had already taken to flight, and, by the aid of his club, bounded so rapidly over the rocks and precipices, that he was soon out of sight.

"Ancona having marked well the path from the cavern to the road, went to the nearest town, and hired camels and mules to remove the property he had acquired. After making restitution to all who remained alive to prove their goods, he became, from what was unclaimed, a man of wealth; all of which was owing to that wit and art which overcame brute strength and courage."

THE SACRED WRITERS.—One prophet speaks to us like an orator, another like a logician. One endeavors by his eloquence to charm us, and another by his clear reasoning to convince our minds. One threatens, and another promises. Here we have presented to our eyes a picture of divine love, and there our ears are arrested by the shrill voice of the warning trumpet. We now hear a voice from Edom, and now a voice from Gerizim. One herald of salvation points us to the smoke of torment that ascendeth up forever and ever, and another, with tender accents of a Saviour's love, cries out, 'Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?'

THE SOUL.—The atheist laughs at the immortality of the soul—the soul that can build her nest among the stars of heaven, walk through yonder mansions, and taste of the rivers that make glad the city of our God—the soul, that can wing her way above the clouds, and survey the crowns and sceptres laid up for those who dare despise the world, and have their conversation in heaven;—the soul, that can live in paradise, while the body is in anguish, and when the fierce winds of worldly tribulation rage around her, can repose in Him who is her all in all.

TEMPORAL JOYS.—It is with our worldly comforts, as it was with the original pleasures of Paradise. Some men for food, and some for trial. God has thought fit, therefore, to limit the use of these terrestrial indulgences, and to signify in his word, that his intent in giving them is, that they shall be our servants, not our masters—advantages to us, and not hindrances, in admiring and adoring the immense goodness and bounty of our Father who is in heaven.

THE WYANDOT'S STORY.

BY C. F. HOFFMAN.

"The mouth of the white man," began the Wyandot, "speaks loud words; the tongue of Chaugha shall only utter truth. The Great Spirit, who is the father of the hearts of men, shall witness that Chaugha does not add one to the number of his wrongs. Forty summers have now passed, since Wintebeh was head man of the Wyandots; he was a great chief—wise at the council fire—terrible in battle; yet was Wintebeh mild and gentle to his friends,—and in his wigwam, grace ever dwelt—Theheti, the daughter of Chaugha, was the delight of the daughters of the Iroquois; and when, after she had borne him three sons, a daughter was added, the chief of the Wyandots could ask nothing more from the Great Spirit to make him happy.

They lived on the borders of The Beautiful River; the woods gave bear, and deer, to the rifle of Wintebeh, and the maize grew in a large open field, near the wigwam of the Wyandots, and buried the hatchet, and exchanged the wampum of peace, with the Miamis. The Delawares had made the meadows women, had taken the hoe and the spade, and lived like the squaws from the great father, the Sagemash king. The Chemocumans had risen against their father, and he wished his red children to join with his warriors, to punish the traitors. Wintebeh, for thought they cannot hurt a man, they disturb his rest."

"The Ghoul's dismay, on hearing Ameen speaking at all, was great; but that was increased to perfect terror when the sounds he heard proceeded, not from one of which would have felled an elephant, as seven flies of an insect's wing. There was no safety, he thought, in a place so wonderful; he had fled from the cave of Wintebeh with tales that his great father, the king, had buried the hatchet, and made peace with the Long-knives—but the chief that his care to such tales.

"My great father," said he, "would not do this, without first telling his red children, that we might all smoke the calumet of peace together."

"Yes, it was so. The great king had been beaten by his children, and he made peace, forgetting the Wyandots, who had taken up the hatchet in his cause.

"Then came a warrior from the Long-knives; he spoke of peace. Wintebeh opened his ears. "The great west," said the "moccumam," is open to the Wyandots; let them, their white brethren, the Ameriquans, have one little spot on the borders of the Beautiful River, and the hatchet shall be buried so deep in the ground, that no man shall hereafter be able to find it."

The words of peace were ever sweet to the ears of Wintebeh—he gave the white man much land—more than he asked—"Child," said he, "let this spot be reserved to Wintebeh and his old men; the young warriors will go to hunt the deer, far, far towards the great lakes." It was so.

Wintebeh remained at his wigwam, by the Beautiful River—and the maize still sprang up, fresh and green in the fields of Tischeti. There the children of Wintebeh grew up, and the soul of the Wyandot rejoiced in the thought that his sons would be first among the warriors of his nation. Outesse, the Bending Flower, was fair as her mother, and when she decked her hair with wreaths of bright flowers, and looked with her smiling eyes in the face of her father, the heart of the great chief was soft, and war and hunting grounds were forgotten in the beauty of his child.

Higachee, the first son of Wintebeh, was now a strong youth—his father said to him, "take this rifle—the great king, Sagemash, gave it to Wintebeh many summers ago—take it, and be brave. Tomorrow, I go to hunt the deer at the Licks, you shall go with me—a good hunter is, in the eyes of the Great Spirit, next to a brave warrior."

At the dawn of day, the Wyandot and his son left the wigwam. Theheti heard nothing—there was peace with the Miamis, the Delawares were women, and the Long-knives had buried the hatchet in a forgotten place. Three days had passed—the fourth had been named by Wintebeh, for his return; yet he came not. Another—and another day—still the wigwam of Theheti was void, and grief was in her heart.—The tenth sun was sinking in the west, when a poor wounded boy crept towards the wigwam—one broken arm hung motionless by his side; his cheeks were hollow, and his eyes looked dim, and his back—oh his back was the mark of the lash. Yes! the lash had cut deep in the flesh of the son of Wintebeh!—for it was Higachee. Outesse tore her hair, and wept aloud at the sight of her brother. The Young Swan looked not on her child, her thoughts were with her absent husband—"Where is he?" she cried—"where is the Great Chief?"

Higachee spoke not—his spirit was fled; he glared round the wigwam with a dull stony eye, and fell to the ground. He was not a great chief—he was only a boy, and shame—the lash—the white man's whip, had made his heart soft. We raised him from the floor; Outesse brought milk to drink, and fresh water to bathe his skin. The boy recovered and the Young Swan hearing a young lady say, that the loves of and Juliet, in the age gone, were pure fiction; there were no Romeo lovers.

ver exist! think'st thou the poet's brain, d weave, when most creative, such a chain beautiful imaginings as those, nna's hopeless lover's fates disclose?

ver exist! On earth there never was n so devoted, say'st thou? 'Tis because, glish archer knows whilst thou art free, gems a hundred votaries for thee.

n but for thee, had never own'd his power, taught a Venus' fav'rite, till thee hour, by service a consideration, giants thee for a time emancipation; e all to implicate. In the same sense, gus's allow'd to turn state's evidence.

ve that Romeo's love is still felt here, 'is not shewn, 'tis your fault, O ye fair! gentlish are ye, hard to be defied, not proverbial that a woman's mind more inconstant than the fickle wind! give encouragement to those who ne'er, your sweet heart's affections ye will share. ch all love's wiles and witchery ye lure, ur yet unconscious victim, till too sure, rankling through the arrow's cankerous point, en smiling, leave him to a broken heart. what of that? 'Twould ill become the fair, ne sex's affections blighted hopes to care. not those wither'd hearts like some fair tree, ered by lightning to sterility, d like some monumental trophy forth, glance your triumphs and proclaim your worth.

hat though thy lover's hopes have in the spring lows and life, e'en in the blossoming, en trampled on and crush'd, what tho' his cheek ectic and wan — his hollow voice bespeak. ersome grief and premature decay, ines, lo-phies, withering away. eking when life is sweetest, in its bloom o look his sorrows in the silent tomb, ous your course proud beauty, blandly smile, nonarches, heartless, pitiless the while. th all your blandishments his heart to snare, teach him to hope, and leave him to despair. en make his arrows wittily a jest, and plant your trophy in his bleeding breast. gense your course triumphantly and gain, lled not, how dearly, so 'tis done—a name.

t is for this that forms so sweetly bright, radiate this dull earth with heavenly light. O! that your natures ye should so pervert, O! that such loveliness should want a heart. Complain not then of us, till you can say, A Juliet's love doth in my bosom play. All fleeting, coquetry, deceit disdain, These evils but revert to you again. Send in that native purity and truth, Which nature stamp'd you, when she bro't ye forth. Then shall our tongues be loos'd from the constraint, That now doth weigh them down, and we shall paint Our passions in such glowing colours, you Shall never doubt, but we're as Romeo true, And with such rapture our dear love shall tell That Romeo himself, you'll own could ne'er excel.

Brooks' Letters.

No. LXVII. Ancona, October 7, 1835.

Set up, up, I must be off. But what a lazy trunk I am upon the road! Rimini we left long before daylight and passed the borders of the Adriatic, we traversed the sea of the sun. Over the water from its bed in the East, it seemed to come as an emblem of the light and civilization which had blazed upon the world. Behind the opposite shore of the sea, but alas, only the emblem is now left, for the land of its birth is sunk in apathy, and the black shrouds of its past are its only glory. The emblem how river, did magnificent honor to the scene. The sky with its thousands of clouds, hung as it were with so many banners of flame. The rich waves of light rolled far and wide across the sea of Heaven—and the shores of the Adriatic bounded in joy, as if in welcome of his coming. Nature as beautiful I never witnessed before, and I could not but connect it in my thoughts with the national pageants of my own home, which even the sky of Italy has not yet equalled in any era.—Delightful as a furious reverie, as I walked upon the sands, or up the little hills—thinking it might be that the glory of the morning was left for the land where was the morning of man, while the brighter evening of his race was pictured in ever own golden West, where not only the clouds assume with red and purple, but the very hills, in their recession, but where the very forests dance in rejoicing, and the treasures of the mountain, the gold and the silver, and the iron, in the depths of the hills? I know not why, but so it is, there is a feeling in this place that a man feels whenever for the first time his eyes fall upon a new river, or a new sea, and the sensations is similar whether it be a river or a sea, though the greater or less according to the magnitude and extent of the waters, or the history connected with them. One of the greatest views, if not the sublimest in the United States, it strikes me, is that junction of the Mississippi and the Ohio, not that there is aught of itself in the scenery around so very astonishing, but the idea of extent and power influence the imagination there, when four great stream of about 3000 miles long mingling with another of 1900 miles, and the greater absorbing the less, which of itself is a mighty river, without even swelling its stream, or widening its banks, as it seems to the eye, and hurl them to course on together a thousand miles more to the ocean! The almost boundless extent, and the awful but silent power of the seaming lazy current affected me more than the sense of Niagara, because extent was associated with power. A like sensation I felt even here on the shores of the Adriatic, because here for the first time, my eyes had had an actual view of the broad sea, small, free and loose as it were, and not in chains as among the lagoons of Venice. But, as in the junction of the Mississippi and the Ohio, of which I have spoken, there is nothing at all astonishing in the scenery around, the sensation is powerful nevertheless. The sight of a new sea is perhaps a new era in a man's life. It may be, that he thinks he has made a new acquisition, and he boast beats proudly at the thought. Or it may be, that I fell around me by the associations of similar objects in the sea, those longings after home, which, every traveller feels, more or less, in a foreign land. I saw the same waters which in their everlasting flow may roll upon the very shores where all my hopes and my heart are, and to a distance in the distance the Adriatic banks of Ancona, of Dalmatia, or of Greece, or it may be some American ship seeking her way to Trieste, I felt that on board each of those there was a link that might connect me with them. The sight of a ship always does a stranger's heart good, when he is in a foreign land, and particularly if he has been long in the interior of that land, for upon it he feels as if he could walk where he will be a stranger and a foreigner no more.—The great glory of the Adriatic though, is not this in the eye of a pilgrim from the new world. It is the only changeless thing amid the ruined empires all around. The oldest of all—yet it is the only thing young. Beauty and youth sit upon its waves and its shores alone. The Mediterranean, the Archipelago, and the Adriatic are as they were when Homer coasted along them, or when the Egyptian sent arts and arms to Greece. Twenty nations, with their opulent cities, their regal palaces, their temples, and their arts, have fallen, upon the Dalmatian borders the Euxine and the Mediterranean alone. The Trojan, the Lydian, the Macedonian, the Persian, the Greek, the Roman and the Turk have each in turn shed their blood, and win their triumphs on its plains. Just over this sea is the land of Persia. Thermopylæ and Cunaxa. An American steamboat in a single day, would carry one quite near the Acropolis and Mars Hill, or the Areopagus of Athens, but the city that Pericles adorned with marble, has but few other relics of interest left than the ground of the place. As we rode along, I could not but think upon the varied races of men that have sailed in arms over these waters, and upon the various means of navigation, from the Grecian and Roman with their galleys, and the Venetian clinging to the coast without a compass to guide him, to that new invention, that new power that a countryman of ours vivified and subdued for the service of man, so as to enable him to defy wind and tide. And it was a source of high gratification to me to see that though I was now upon one of the oldest known seas of the world, which the prow had been cleaving ever since the short was spread to catch the wind to move the wood, yet that upon all these seas from the hour I could learn, aye, even from the pillars of Hercules to the Euxine, from the mouth of the Nile to Genoa the Superb, seas where Arts and Arms and Commerce had their birth,—yet that upon all these, thus laving the shores of Egypt, and Palestine, and Greece, and Italy, and Turkey, and Gallia, and Spain there are not so many shambouls now as there are upon the magic inland waters of Lake Erie, where only years ago the savage regaled and the tomahawk was brandished in terror! Good God, what an idea does this give of the growth and promise of my country! I verily believe that the inland trade of the single State of N. York is now worth all the trade of the whole Mediterranean, and its tributaries. The three hundred steamboats of the Mississippi would create more astonishment here than did the sons of the Persian monarch when he lashed the sea, and the vast inland vale from which they come in a world almost, if not quite as large as Thucydides or Strabo dreamed of.

But up—up, and on. Every little thought pulls me back upon some speculation, and I shall never get to Rome. I get along as slowly as our returns goes. Our third day's ride was all along the Adriatic, on the old Via Flaminia. Cattolica we passed a town so called, from having served as a place of refuge to the orthodox pertaters, who in the time of the Council of Rimini, separated themselves from the Arian or Innocenia heritage. Pesaro, once a Roman colony, was the town in which we made our regular noon-day halt. Its villa inhabited by the late Queen of England is about one mile from here, and in her pleasure grounds are two monuments, the one erected to the memory of her brother, who fell at Waterloo, and the other to the memory of her daughter, the late Princess Charlotte, of Wales. General Bum-paris made this his head quarters too, when as the Republican General, he was driving the Austrians from Italy. The ancient Pisaurum Portunus, was the next town we entered. It is upon the coast of the Adriatic, near the mouth of the ancient Metaurus a river famous for having witnessed the defeat of Asdrubal, A. U. C. 545, by the Roman Consuls of that year. But at Fano, we only halted to fill our vetturino with four catholic priests, one a Jesuit, and one a Benedictine, and the others of what orders I do not know;—and when we started again, we were in the train of two other vetturinos full of catholic priests, all bound to Rome. The Jesuit did not bite me, and the others were very civil, though one of them loved his beads and his Latin prayer book more than conversation, probably because I murdered his Italian so. But they have one droll habit to which I have not as yet become accustomed, though I have witnessed it among all classes of men from the Rhine to the Adriatic—and that is, the custom of kissing each other, and embracing, for the same reason, that we shake hands. Now though there might be some sense in kissing a pretty cousin or a pretty female friend whom one had not seen for many a day, yet it is indeed dull to see ten or twelve strapping great men with long beards often, and stiff mustaches, busily kissing as many others as strapping as themselves. But such, nevertheless, was the drollery we witnessed at Senigallia, where we halted for the night, and where our whole flock of priests kissed every stray sheep of whom they met, of every other flock. However, I have made up my mind long ago to think one custom in one part of the world as reasonable as another, and when the man in America tells me what is the use of shaking hands, I will tell him what is the use of kissing in Italy. The kissing ceremony with half of the world has reason and feeling on its side, but the shaking hand, with gloves on, has not even that. Every time I sneezed, the priests wished some saint would bless me, and bowed their heads, and the blessing came down thick, and the bows often, for I had a most amazing cold. If there is a sneezing saint then, and he bears the benedictions of the priests, my life will be a lucky one.

Off before day light we were again on our fourth day's journey in our vetturino. I am out of all patience with the horses that are never made to trot, but that trip along in a quick stepping walk. However, a man must never be in a hurry in Italy.—That is the first lesson he must learn. An American must in this respect unchange his whole man, and forget his whole education. Our route this day was along the Adriatic. On one side was the calm sea, and the blue sky, and on the other gentle hills sloping gradually toward the water, but the quickest the road is passed over the better for the traveller. The promontory of Ancona was in sight long before we reached it. At last we were rolling along the rocks thrown up to beat back the sea. The citadel was passed. The gates were reached, and a French soldier in his red breeches and long grey coat was standing there. A French army here on the Adriatic, the tri-colored flag waving over the walls, the poor Pope plundered on the flank by Austria, and on the other by France! Nevertheless I am so weary of the Austrian white coat, and the Papal lecomotives in uniform, that a laughing happy little Frenchman is to the eye as sun-rise in the dewy.

LXVIII. Rome, October 12, 1835.

I have been travelling in a Roman Diligence ever since I can remember—and at last I am housed within the walls of "the Eternal city." The mode manner of coming, briefly, as the preachers say, and recondly—upon matters and things in general, be omni, you will cry—and first of the first, let me go back to Ancona.

Ancona retains its ancient name, a word of Greek origin, approached of the angular form of the promontory on which the town is placed, and Strabo ascribes its foundation to the Syracusan who fled from the tyranny of Dionysius. The town has a magnificent quay, and perfectly fine harbor of a circular form, which Trajan enlarged and improved at his own expense. A triumphal arch at Corinthian order erected near the Port, to commemorate this act of princely beneficence, is well proportioned, finely fretted, simple, grand, and composed of very large blocks of Ferrean marble. It is now the great Roman harbor of the Adriatic, and perhaps the only Roman city, on which there exists any Commerce of any great extent, or much business, life and energy. The Pope allows there, for the sake of commerce, all religion, and thus the useful intermingling of the Protestant and the Heterox with the Catholic faith, creates something like activity in this free Port. But the streets, even the widest of them, are so narrow that two carriages can hardly pass abreast, and there are many of them in which no carriage can go at all. The walls are too small for the population, and hence the houses are over-crowded with inhabitants—and full of myrtle and myrtle of them.

Among the public edifices, the Cathedral is the most prominent. It stands on a high and commanding summit, with the busy city beneath, the Appennines not far off on the side of land, and the Adriatic, with the opposite coast of Dalmatia sometimes visible, on the other side. The position and the view are superb, and every traveller should wind up the hill to see the cathedral and the view. It is, as I said, on a site of a Temple of Venus, which shows, if such be the fact, that the ancient worshippers of that beautiful divinity knew how to give her the choicest place for a temple. The Lazaretto, built by the Austrians, is a noble pile of great height, and the vast inland vale from which they come in a world almost, if not quite as large as Thucydides or Strabo dreamed of.

Ancona is built at right about one o'clock, in a Roman stage coach that carried twelve persons and that could carry almost as many more. The French garrisons extend no further than the walls of the city, and there of course we lost sight of them. The French by the way, have not left the port of Ancona because the Austrians garrisoned Bologna and Ferrara and Forli, and thus the two great powers between them, are taking care of the eastern dominions of the Holy See. The next town of importance we reached was Loretto, so famous for having within one of its churches the Santa Casa, the Holy House in which not only Christ was born and bred for twelve years, but his mother Mary also, which afforded the Holy House having been in constant danger in Nazareth of Galilee from the armies of Titus Vespasian, but in a danger more imminent afterwards when Galilee was in possession of the infidels, and every professor of Christianity was put to the sword, at last in 1291 was lifted from its foundations by angels, and transported through the air as far as Dalmatia, but not liking that residence, three years afterwards, took another jump across the Adriatic sea, and alighted in the dead of night in a forest near Recanati, not far from Loretto, where all the trees bowed down to the ground and thus remained in reverence, like the ship in which St. Anthony preached, as long as the Holy House continued among them. The Virgin Mary there took notice of the house, and devotees and pilgrims flocked first on the sacred dwelling, and then the sacred temples, some thieves and robbers there to plunder the pilgrims as they came, the Holy House, after a sitting of only eight months, took another flight, and settled down about a mile further off, on the joint property of two brothers, but the brothers quarrelling and fighting at last about the division of the soil of the pilgrims, the Holy House took its last and final jump upon its present situation, where the people of Loretto have covered it in a splendid church, and where pilgrims have adorned it with the dazzling treasures of golden lamps, censers, statues, chalices, vases of gold and silver, jewels, gems, robes, pictures, mosaics, the ex voto offerings of nobles and crowned heads, as well as of the humble and the poor. The scarlet gown that the Virgin had on when the Angel Gabriel appeared to her, and the holy porringer in which Jesus was fed, are also to be seen. Any Agnus Dei, rosary, crucifix, &c. &c. shaken about reverently in this holy porringer by the proper priest, will cure the disease of the owner, and even keep off the devil himself.

The immense treasures of this Holy House the French in their invasion of Italy appropriated to their own use about the time that they abolished sandals, and found out a new God, and filled Peter with the guillotine. At the Restoration the image of the Holy Mother of God got back to Loretto, and princes and nobles have been since enriching it, while the pilgrims are yet grooving the marble floor on their creeping knees. The history of the Holy House that I have given you, I have translated from an Italian chronicle, in my own words to be sure, but keeping to the facts, which are much more seriously told, however than I have told them. Prince Eugene Beauharnais, Maria Louisa, Ex-Duchess of Parma and Queen of Etruria, Charles the Fourth of Spain, the Princess of Wirtemberg, the Emperor of Austria, and such like personages have enriched this place with emeralds and amethysts, and turquoise rings set in gold, and rubies, and pearls, and garnets, all for the Holy Mother of God, who when on earth was content with the earthen holy porringer, to feed her child, tired in a humble house no better than the cabin of an Indian woodcutter on the banks of the Ohio.

My book of which I have spoken, has given me my chief knowledge of the Holy House. For though I was in Loretto at early morning, the house where pilgrims throng to the church, and when the altars are most brightly lit up, and the treasures seem the richest, I had but a hasty look, for my breakfast was at the time inviting me more than this flying house of the Saviour, and the book I concluded would better instruct me than the priests. It was about day-light when our diligence reached its stopping place in the town, and one of the first voices I heard at the windows of the coach was a man whispering in a very low tone, that he had something important to show us, if we would descend. My friend and myself descended, and followed him in a narrow alley of a dim and doubtful look, and there entering into a little shop, we found various kinds of relics for sale, rosaries, &c. all blessed in the holy porringer, and among them all the book which gave us the miraculous history of the Holy House. After spottering out what bad Italian we knew at the talk he had made us take in order to see his relics and his book, we bought the last, and I busied myself in reading it on our way in the diligence to Rome.

After quitting the great pilgrimage ground of the Christian world, which rivals Jerusalem and St. Peters, where men and women have thronged in caravans, with their banners, their Governors, and their Priests even to the number of 100,000 at a time it is said, performing the most painful devotions on their knees, around the circuit of the Holy House in such multitudes as I have hinted before, that they groove in the marble even to the depth of an inch and a half,—we started for Foligno, across the Appennines on our way to Rome.—Macerata was one of the first towns we passed, of about 10,000 inhabitants, situated in the summit of a mountain where the traveller can see the Adriatic, often a delightful view when it is the first, as the voyager comes from the side of the Mediterranean. Tolentino was one of the next towns that we entered, nothing very remarkable, unless it be in having the sepulchre of St. Nicholas, and in being the place where the treaty was signed between the Pope and Bonaparte when the conqueror gave the Belvidere Apollo, and the toilette of the Virgin of Loretto. Valcimaro, a poverty stricken village, situated in a valley covered with superb oaks crowns next, and then the plain comes, and then the ascent is continued up to the narrow passage of Serravalle (the name valley and ascent made with six horses, two postillions, and two pokes of oxen at the rate of about a mile or a little more an hour, though it was far from being so very difficult. Oxen, however, among the Appennines, are indispensable appendages to the Post, as it seems.

Serravalle is a village crowded between two mountains which are the distinct one from the other. It was the boundary line of the late Kingdom of Italy, near here is the little village of Camerino which Livy says, furnished 600 men to Scipio to pass into Africa. The ruins of walls, and gates of an ancient gothic castle are to be seen there at the present day. After this, we entered the narrow passage of Col Fiorito, where the road is carved in the rock, and forms a demicircle of about two miles in extent, and so very narrow is it, that if two carriages meet, it is always difficult, and often quite impossible without retrograding, to pass. Next comes the village of Case Nuove in a territory as sterile as death, the only resource of whose inhabitants seems to be the charity of the passing travellers for men, women and children invoked us in all the names of the thirty thousand Saints, more or less, with the Virgin Mary in the bargain, to relieve their wants, promising us if we did, ten thousand blessings—now bowing their heads to the earth, now kneeling in the dirt, resorting in short to all the ingenious devices that could touch our hearts. My own hippy country! How happy are you in never being shocked with such spectacles of human misery and degradation.

Foligno came next, but it was deep night when we arrived there. The worst passes of the Appennines we had surmounted and cleared. The scenery had been wild and naked, but the quicker it is passed, the happier the traveller will be. Too much misery meets the eye, to induce one to wish for a longer tarry. Our Diligence stopped at Foligno until day, and out of the three unencumbered seats, I made my bed for the night, much more comfortable I found in the morning than my flea-bitten companions who occupied it the Home.—Day light showed us, that Foligno was in a pretty vale, and our eyes were delighted again to behold hills covered with verdure and with trees. The remains of the ancient temple of Mutumus, that classic stream sung by the Poets from Virgil to Claudian, was on the summit of the hill by our road. A Cathedral and a convent, and palaces of Bishops and Monks have left but little of that beauty that the architect Palladio so much admired.—Virgil as his Georgics sweet, but the devastations of Mutumus, and flocks (albiaregal) and lordly bulls (maxima taurus) that bled for the gods, and bring Roman triumphs to their temples. But Clitumnus has lost its virtue since the days of Propertius and Silvius Italicus, for now though the cattle are white, they are not those plump milk white snowy bulls that become the whiter from living in and drinking of the stream. And though the scenery was pretty enough, yet I was far from agreeing with Pliny, when he begins Mutumus, and ends the one, that "there is nothing with which you may not be pleased." In summa, nihil erit ex quo non capiat voluptatem—for the Italians, I suppose, have no idea of beauty, or love, charity, charity, something, something—give me something, is now louder than even the species of the river god, or the prayers of the Virgin Mary, or the Saints.

I feel now that I am on classic ground, and as I saw on the highlands of Scotland with the Lady of the Lake in my hand, or on the Lakes of Westmoreland with the Poems of Wordsworth,—objects, the inspiration of British genius,—even so I now began to see, who and inspired the pen of a Virgil and a Horace. The walls of Spoleto, the Spoletium of Livy, are before me on the acclivity of a mountain covered with verdure, and the Temple of Concordia Hannibal, when flushed with victory on the L

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

We have received from Messrs. Carey, Lea & Blanchard, Boothbridge and Hughes's Discussion—The Divorced; by the authoress of the Disinherited—and 'Adventures of a Gentleman in Search of a Horse—with owls. We shall notice them next week.

Open Confessions—By Theodore Dwight—published by Van Nostrand & Dwight, 146 Nassau street, N. York. This book is composed of extracts from "Six Months in a Convent," by Mrs. Rowe; Maria Monk's "Awful Disclosures," and Cardinal Rossi's "Secrets of Female Convents Disclosed"—with deductions therefrom intended to impress upon protestants, the absurdity and danger of submitting their children to the guidance of catholic teachers, inasmuch as seminaries and popish nunneries are as dangerous to the morals and degrading to the characters of a republican community. We wish the author had abstained from making extracts from such a work as that of Maria Monk. He is to say the least unwise in this, the testimony of Maria Monk will give very little credence, and only weaken the position he has taken, which is a good one, for surely a greater absurdity cannot possibly exist than for protestant parents to send their children to catholic seminaries, where if they are not enticed into the Roman belief by those who are most anxious for proselytes, or their young minds blinded and led astray by the imposing ceremonies of catholicism—they will at least be debarred from their instruction and observance of their faith, which is in the duty of every parent to impress upon the mind of his or her offspring—"Train up a child in the way he should go," saith the scripture.

Scenery Illustrated—By A. Lidney Doane, A. M., M. D. compiled from the works of Cuvier, Bond Volpons, and Humboldt with 32 plates. Published by Harper & Brothers, of New York, and sold by Perkins, of Chestnut street.

This small, yet, we should conceive will be a most valuable addition to the library of every surgeon throughout the states. It treats upon hernias, fractures of the extremities and surgical operations which are all illustrated by finely executed engravings. The author has compiled from most valuable sources, —in his preface he says

"In this work we make no pretensions to originality, thinking that the profession will be benefited more by a compilation of facts than by an original book of theory. Our aim has been to be useful. It is for medical men to determine whether we are or are not successful."

We have received from Messrs. Harper & Brothers of New York, a beautiful work in one volume entitled Frank, by Maria Edgeworth. Now what more gentle reader would you have us say? Nothing! for the name of Maria Edgeworth speaks more to you than the highest eulogy could from our pen "What's in a name" forsooth does Shakspeare say? It is evident he was never a publisher or he would have known better, you want nothing further from us then kind reader, than the necessary information that the book is to be purchased of Mr. Perkins, of Chestnut st., we do not mean to take leave of you without first telling you that the volume contains two beautiful line engravings by A. Dick, from drawings by W. Page.

The Mechanics' Book—By a lady.—Published by W. Marshall & Co. The taste and discrimination for which woman has ever been remarkable, is evinced in the sweet little book before us. It is a collection of gems from the most admired of authors. Flowers whose perfume has outlived in some instances the hands which engendered them, and in others still lend a cause to those fondly cherished spirits with dewy odour are culled without one noxious weed to blur the bright coronal—When we mention amongst a whole host of talented writers, such names as Mrs. Hemans, one who by precept and practice has done more to aid the cause of religion than many a profound teacher of the word; Mrs. Hannah More; Mrs. Sigourney; Miss Landon; Miss Baillie and Mary Moore—Dr. Blair; Professor Wilson; Montgomery; Alaric A. Watts; Baxter; Archbishop Leighton; Addison and William Penn, we are sure that we have said enough to recommend it to every family who can read.

The Earth:—Its physical condition and most remarkable phenomena, by W. Mullinger Higgins, fellow of the geological society and lecturer on natural philosophy at Guy's hospital, author of the work, hailstand with fine cuts, published by Messrs. Harper & Brother, New York, and sold by W. Perkins Chesnut street, Philadelphia.

We have to acknowledge the receipt of the above most interesting work from Messrs. Harper & Brothers. We can much delighted with it, having rarely seen so much useful information compressed in so small volume. It is a medium in parvo that would repay the purchaser were the price double what it is. Highly delighted as we have been with this pithy record of the earth's phenomenon, which we fearlessly state is not to be found in any other work of its one volume, we confess that we are doubly pleased with it from the beautiful reflections with which it is interspersed, by one who looks from "Nature up to Nature's God."

ECHOES.

There is one other subject of inquiry connected with the atmosphere as a conductor of sound that seems worthy of notice in this place; and that is, the circumstances under which echoes have been heard. An echo is produced whenever sound meets with an obstacle of sufficient regularity to reflect it. The laws by which the reflection of sound is governed are the same as those that influence light under the same circumstances; if it be obstructed by a plane surface, the direction will be changed, but the pulse will be parallel; if by a concave, it will converge; if by a convex, it will diverge. A wall, on the side and ceiling of a room or public building, may occasion echoes; but as sound travels with a great velocity, and as it takes no perceptible time in moving from one part of a room to another, the echo is so blended with the original sound that the two appear as one. In large buildings, however, this may not be the case, and then the echo frequently becomes a serious inconvenience. We may notice one or two of the most remarkable instances in nature and in art.

On the banks of the Rhine, near Lorley, there is an echo that repeats the sound several times, and has been frequently described by travellers.

In the whispering-gallery of St. Paul's Church, London, the faintest whisper is conveyed from one side of the dome to the other. The tick of a watch may be heard from one end to the other of the Abbey of St. Albans; and in Woodstock Park, there is an echo that repeats seventeen syllables by day, and twenty by night. In the Cathedral of Girgenti, in Sicily, there is an echo by which a sound, on descending from the great western door to the cornice behind the altar. The confessional happened to be placed at the former, and some over-curious persons resorted to the latter for news, till by some mishap a lacquer once heard more than was convenient, by which the secret became known, and the confessional was consequently removed. At the sepulchre of Mecella, the wife of Cæsar, there was an echo that repeated five times. We are informed by Barthius, in his notes on Statius's "Thebais," that on the banks of the Nahs, between Cobleentz and Bingen, an echo repeated the words of a man seventeen times; and although the repetitions in, in most echoes, heard after the word or note of the person who speaks or sings, in this instance the repetitions follow the original sound so rapidly and clearly, with such variation, that the voice seems to be lost in the multitude of mimicry.

In times when men were less interested in the investigation of the causes of the phenomena they heard or saw, the echo must have exceedingly perplexed them. Were we permitted to indulge imagination, it would not be difficult to picture to ourselves the amazement and consternation with which an inhabitant of the newly-peopled earth would be seized, when he first heard the rocks far and near reiterating the broken sentences that escaped from his lips, as he wandered alone by the banks of a river, or chased the deer in the mountains. There is much in external nature calculated to awaken that consciousness of invisible power which resides in every bosom that has not been entirely contaminated by vice. The Greeks, whose luxuriant imaginations were ever active in the personification of natural phenomena, have given to echo a place among the gods. The reader will recall to memory her history. She is described as the daughter of Air and Tellus, the attendant of Juno, and the confidant of Jupiter. Her loquacity, however, displeased the god, and she was so far deprived of speech as to only have the power of reply when spoken to. Pan was once her admirer, but never enjoyed her smiles. Narcissus was the object of her choice, but he despised her, and she pined to death, though her voice is still heard on the earth. It is unnecessary to point out the aptness and beauty of its personification.

We have been much pleased with the letter of the Washington correspondent of the N. York Commercial Advertiser, giving a history of the final passage of the bill—and therefore extract a portion of it. His complimentary notice of the business tact of our friend, Dr. Sutherland is quite gratifying.

* * * *

The House went into committee of the whole on the deposite bill. I was glad to see Mr. Sutherland in the chair. I hailed the circumstance as an earnest that the bill would be pushed through before adjournment. The Doctor is worth a dozen Polks. There is, perhaps, a little too much of the slap-dash style in this manner of putting bill after bill, or proposition after proposition, aside. He gets through the formalities with immense despatch. He has a most convenient deafness and blindness to those who, he imagines, will indulge in prolixity. Many a member has had his speech knocked out of his head by the Doctor's hurried and resolute "committee ready for the question?" which has more of an assertive expression, than an interrogatory. Those who are in the vicinity of the chair are exceedingly amused with his comments on the members accepting the floor. He is constantly muttering 'Aye, very well!' or 'pooh! pooh!' 'nonsense!' 'all stuff,' &c. &c.

To-day he actually galloped through the various sections of the bill, and disposed of the amendments with equal promptitude. He had reached the thirteenth section before one o'clock. Had Mr. Polk been in the chair that point would not have been arrived at to-day.

It is not necessary to occupy any portion of your columns with the amendments that were lost. Up to the thirteenth section, it seemed to be the determination of the friends of the measure to pass it, if possible, without any alteration, so as to prevent it from being sent back to the Senate, where it might be delayed. There appeared to be a general apprehension among them that the president would apply his veto; and with no reference to that, it was important to send the bill to him as soon as possible—to-morrow, or next day, at the farthest—lest he might put it in his pocket, and make no return of it at the present session.

Just at this stage, however, it was whispered about that Anthony, of Pennsylvania, had an amendment to offer, which, without making any material alteration in the bill, would render it acceptable to the president. It was even said that the amendment came to the House from the palace, and was in the hand writing of Dawson, the president's private secretary. This caused, as you may imagine, a great deal of stir. Mr. Anthony rose, and explained at length the points of difference between this amendment and the provisions of the original bill.

* * * *

The fact is, it was merely introduced to conciliate the favor of the president, and allow him a loop-hole by which to escape from the position which he had at first taken, of determined hostility to the bill. It is now known that on Monday night a grand caucus was held, and the result of the consultation was a decided conviction that the bill could be carried through, notwithstanding. The amendment in question was then resolved upon; and yesterday it was brought down to the house, and the greatest pains taken to assure the friends of the measure that if they would adopt it, there would be no obstacle to the bill becoming a law. It was pretended that the president was opposed to the measure because it made a donation or loan of the states; when in fact, the remarkable part of this amendment is that which takes away the purely deposite character which the bill, as it originally stood, gave to the sums distributed, and substitutes that of a donation!—practically at least, and in terms making it a loan.

The friends of the bill among the whigs were at first rather disinclined to go for it, although they did not regard it as an alteration of any importance; but the supporters of the administration, who were also congratulating that the bill, were so anxious for it, and made so many protestations that it would certainly pass the Senate, and make the measure agreeable to the president, that our party yielded, and left the matter in the hands chiefly of those whom Cambreleng and his little faction are now crying out against as recreants from the principles of the Administration.

The party is in great trouble. The unscrupulous adherents of Van Buren cannot conceal their indignation at the conduct of the disaffected. They declare that those who have gone for the bill, have abandoned the principles of the Administration, and one of their leaders asserts, that had the thing carried on the beginning of the session, Van Buren would have been beaten out of the field.

ORGANIZATION OF THE NAVY BILL.

We were among the first to congratulate our subscribers upon the probability of a bill passing into a law which would provide for a number of idle boys now roaming about the streets, to the destruction of their morals, and render them able and efficient seamen—entirely reorganize the navy and support and uphold the proud station we own amongst nations. We have now to inform our readers that there is no doubt entertained upon the subject. We copy a report of the most important proceedings on the subject.

On motion of Mr. Southard, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill for the organization of the navy.

On motion to Mr. Southard, the bill was amended by striking out the words "four rear admirals."

Mr. Southard moved to strike out "nine," before commodores, and insert "thirteen."

Mr. Cuthbert moved to divide the question, but it was decided by the Chair to be out of order.

The question on the motion of Mr. Southard was then decided in the negative.

The question on the motion of Mr. Southard was then decided in the negative.

Mr. Cuthbert then moved to strike out the whole of the commodores, so as to destroy that rank.

Mr. Southard asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. Webster expressed a wish to retain the rear admirals and strike out the commodores.—He would move when out of committee, to restore the rear admirals, and would now vote against the commodores.

The proposition to take the question by yeas and nays was then withdrawn, and the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. Cuthbert moved to amend the bill by striking out the grade of second lieutenant, which was agreed to.

Mr. Webster moved to increase the number of "first" lieutenants from 250 to 350, so as to include the number which had been included under the head of "second" lieutenants, which was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in, except that in relation to our rear admirals.

On motion of Mr. Webster, the bill was so amended as to make one admiral, one vice admiral, and three rear admirals—yeas 18 nays 10.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Hanging by Accident.—A person named Hanlon, near Stradbally, Queen's county, has come by his death under the following circumstances. A great number of the peasantry assembled at a wake in the neighborhood, where plays were performed during the night. One of these represented a mock trial, in which the unfortunate man was sentenced to be hanged. They tied him up to a collar beam; while standing on a chair, in this position, two men kicked the chair from under him—he fell, and although cut down in a few seconds, it was found that he was strangled. The man, it is reported, died in a short time, and the two men have absconded.—Dublin paper.

Ardent Spirits and Pauperism.—The Steward of the Philadelphia Alms House, recently communicated to a Committee of the Union Temperance Association of this city, the fact, that twelve hundred and forty-three paupers had been admitted to the establishment in one year, and that eight out of ten of the adult; were intemperate. The superintendent of the children's department, stated it as his conviction from close observation during a period of eleven years, that ninety out of every hundred children admitted, were the offspring of intemperate parents.

The following is the amount of duties paid by the undermentioned auctioneers, for the last three months.

To Capitalists.—We would invite the attention of capitalists wishing to make desirable purchases of water power, coal lands, eligible scites for commercial or manufacturing purposes, village lots, or lands by the acre in this vicinity, to the chart and advertisement of Mr. Gould, on our fourth page. A glance at the chart on which are laid down the numerous rail roads and canals of Eastern Ohio, and western New York, and Pennsylvania, all concentrating at the mouth of Beaver, will, alone we think, be sufficient to convince even the most incredulous of the unparalleled advantages of the Falls of Beaver.—Argus.

Texas has been to Santa Anna and his army, what Moscow was to Napoleon, if not worse. It is computed that there has been since the campaign commenced, 5000 Mexicans put hors de combat—of which 1100 were at the attack on the Alamo, 300 disabled at the mission of Refugio, 600 killed and 400 taken prisoners at the battle of Jacinto, by the Texians, under Houston, it is said, surrendered lately under General Wool.

The journeymen carpenters, in New York, have struck for an additional quarter per diem; the present rate is $1,75—they demand $2. They have been parading the streets in procession, with mottoe and banners.

Freshet.—The Lexington Union, of the 17th, states, that "the lower section of the James river canal, through the mountains is almost entirely destroyed, and that the upper section is greatly damaged. It is thought that $100,000 would hardly repair it. The bridge at Lynchburg was partially destroyed.

COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION OF THE U. STATES.

The annual statement of the Commerce and Navigation of the United States for the year ending 30th September, 1835, lately laid before Congress, presents the following general results. They are derived from that document by the Washington correspondent of the New York Journal of commerce.

The imports during the year, (ending 30th Sept. last,) amounted, in value, to $149,995,741, of which there was imported in American vessels $135,980,865, and in foreign vessels $14,006,877. The exports during the same year amounted to $121,693,577, of which $101,189,092 were of domestic, and $20,504,485 of foreign articles. Of the domestic articles, $79,022,746 were exported in American vessels, and $22,166,336 in foreign vessels. Of the foreign articles, $15,112,445 were exported in American vessels, and $5,392,040 in foreign vessels. Of American shipping, 1,382,653 tons entered, and 1,400,517 cleared from the ports of the United States. Of foreign shipping 641,310 tons entered, and 630,604 cleared.

The greatest imports in any previous year, were in 1816, at the close of the war, when they amounted to $147,103,000,—being $2,792,742 less than last year; and the greatest exports in 1807, when they amounted to $108,843,150, or $12,850,427 less than last year.—Of the exports in 1807, only $48,699,592 consisted of domestic articles, whereas last year the domestic exports amounted to $101,189,092. The year in every case unless otherwise specified, ends 30th of September.) In 1834 the imports amounted to $126,521,332, being $23,374,410 less than in 1835; and the domestic exports to $81,924,162, or $20,164,920 less than 1835.

In some of the German and Swiss schools, it is the practice, in several respects excellent, to take the boys or a portion of them, on pedestrian excursions of several weeks duration, in the course of which they not only refresh their minds as well as bodies by healthful exercise and excitement, but acquire useful knowledge. We perceive that the Managers of the Pennsylvania Lyceum, in Philadelphia, have made arrangements for an excursion of this kind into Northampton and Schuylkill counties. They have appointed a committee, to be accompanied by several naturalists, a surveyor and civil engineer, to take a number of lads, over fourteen, on an exploring, geological and surveying expedition. In this they afford evidence of an enlightened perception of the means and end of youthful culture.

The State Legislature adjourned on the 16th ult. The extra session lasted precisely a month, and in that time a great business of a public and private character was transacted. The amendments in question was then resolved upon; and yesterday it was brought down to the house, and the greatest pains taken to assure the friends of the measure that if they would adopt it, there would be no obstacle to the bill becoming a law. It was pretended that the president was opposed to the measure because it made a donation or loan of the states; when in fact, the remarkable part of this amendment is that which takes away the purely deposite character which the bill, as it originally stood, gave to the sums distributed, and substitutes that of a donation!—practically at least, and in terms making it a loan.

Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.—The bill to authorise the final settlement of the controversy between the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, John Randal, jr. and its other creditors, has passed both houses of the Legislature of Delaware by a unanimous vote. All parties, whether stockholders or creditors, are now fully satisfied. The controversy has terminated in a settlement upon just and equitable principles. What is the best of all, the public will rejoice to learn, that this canal, which is one of the most splendid and useful of all the works of internal improvement in this country, is now open for vessels drawing from six to seven feet water; and by this arrangement is now free for ever from any obstruction to the navigation. The trade of the canal is said to have doubled, beyond any thing known, before this arrangement was made.

Strange Dream and Affecting Confirmation.—The details of a melancholy and strange affair, we find in the Lynchburg Virginian. A number of young ladies were assembled at the house of Mrs. Womack, residing in Bedford county. The meeting of the young females were naturally attended with the buoyancies of unaffected innocence, but the old lady could not join in their youthful joys, the illusion of a horrid dream rested upon her imagination; thrice had the same vision passed before her sleeping eyes, and at each time a heavy calamity had fallen upon her. With these feelings she retired to her bed, vainly striving to solve the fearful mystery, when a loud shriek attended with the sharp noise of a musket discharge, called her to the room occupied by her daughter and young visitors. The first sight that met her eyes was the mangled form of her daughter, about 13 years old, lying on the floor and weltering in her blood, having been dreadfully injured by the discharge of a gun, which had been pointed and snapped at her by a companion, who supposed it not to be loaded. The gun had been frequently snapped during the day, and at the time it went off was without priming.

Grain Crops.—We have learnt from a source worthy of entire confidence, that the reports from all parts of Maryland are discouraging. They speak of great damage from the Hessian fly to the Wheat, and many represent the destruction as total. Letters from Washington county, Maryland, the best district in the state for wheat, represent the crop as most seriously injured. In Lancaster county, Pa. the crop is not expected to be equal to one fourth of an average crop; so also in the adjoining counties of Pennsylvania. The wheat crops in the State of Delaware are also represented as equally unpromising with the above. In reply, says our informant, to an enquiry made of a most respectable farmer of Lancaster county, whether the present wet weather would not retrieve the crop, he said it would not, that the wheat was not there to grow. The Rye crop throughout is bad. It cannot be estimated at more than a quarter of a crop.—National Gazette.

Velocity of Railways.—A London paper states that Dr. Lardner, President of the Southwark Literary Society, lately delivered a lecture to the members of that institution, on the subject of rail-roads, in which he remarked on the extraordinary velocity which has been acquired since the application of steam to locomotive purposes—30 or 35 miles an hour was the extent of the velocity originally contemplated—but Dr. Lardner stated that he had lately travelled at the rate of 60 miles an hour, actually performing fifteen miles in fifteen minutes! He could set no limits to the velocity to be attained by these locomotives, for it only required a sufficient power of steam to be applied, and the machinery is competent to accomplish 70 or 80 miles an hour. The learned Professor thought it not improbable that when the Birmingham Rail Road is completed, that the passenger cars will traverse the whole distance, one hundred and twenty miles, in what is called the first class train, in one hour and a half, or even in one hour and twenty minutes; and the second class train at the very slow rate of forty-five miles an hour!

Almost every town of Ireland, has its contending factions—its Montagues and Capulets or rather its locofocos and monopolists. In Clonmel we perceive the present war, in that place is conducted by the "Shanavests" and the "Caravats."

Important Announcement.—The Autocrat of Russia, is determined to have a ballet which shall outstrip the world in numbers, and in costume. An English paper says:—"The Emperor of Russia has sent to this country an order, for one thousand pair of flesh-coloured silk pantaloons, for the dancers of St. Petersburg and Moscow.—They are to arrive at their destination before the end of August."

A singular phenomenon occurred at Montevideo, in September last. There was a depression of the sea thirty hours, the waters having retired from the harbor, and exposed all the ships at anchor in the mud.

Murder will out.—An old man named Henry Roper, was lately committed to Nottingham county jail, England, charged, on his own confession, with a rape and murder, committed more than thirty years ago.

GENERAL HOUSTON.

The following brief sketch of the life of General Houston, the commander of the Texan army, is extracted from the Philadelphia Enquirer. It will be seen that his life has been an eventful one. General Houston is now about forty-two years of age:—

"The first time that I ever saw Houston was, I think, in the year 1830. As I was standing at the corner of College street, Nashville, Tennessee, with a friend, a fine looking man dashed by us and I was induced to inquire his name.

That, Sir, said my friend, is Major Houston, a young man of great promise—he is rapidly rising in public favor. He is brave, and fought gallantly with General Jackson, and in the lapse of a few years will be Governor of Tennessee.

I learned that Major Houston was originally a carpenter, but soon quitted the profession, and commenced the study of law, politics, and arms. To the latter science he was most enthusiastically devoted! but as war was now at an end, he confined himself to politics and law. Soon after he was elected to Congress, and as a member of the House of Representatives, held a commanding position. His popularity was steady and rapid in the increase, and the year 1828 found him Governor of the State of Tennessee. In the years of 1816—'17, with the Seminoles and Creeks, he distinguished himself as a gallant soldier; and at the celebrated battle of the Horse Shoe, he was badly wounded in the arm, which disabled him. In 1826, having in debate answered severely on the removal of Mr. Curry from the Post Office at Nashville, and the appointment of Mr. J. P. Irwin, a near relative of Mr. Clay, he was challenged by that gentleman to mortal combat. The parties met in Kentucky—Irwin was shot and badly wounded, and though no exceptions were taken to the mode in which Houston conducted himself on the occasion, an indictment was obtained against him, for political effect, as he alleged, as he was at that time a candidate for the office of Governor of Tennessee.

On the 20th of February, 1828, whilst holding the office of Chief Magistrate of Tennessee, he challenged Chapman Johnson, of Virginia, to the field, and the invitation was declined. At the Virginia Convention of that year, Mr. Johnson reported an address to the people of Virginia, recommending the re-election of Mr. Clay, and in that address, those who had participated in the battle of the Horse Shoe, as Gov. Houston understood it, were treated with great severity. As one of the actors in that battle, Gov. Houston demanded redress from Mr. Johnson; in reply to which that gentleman stated that the address was the production of a Convention of two hundred, and he could not consider himself personally responsible for the acts of that body.

On the 10th day of April, 1828, Governor Houston formally resigned the office of Governor of Tennessee, and abjured the State. Assuming the garb of an Indian, he departed for the remote scenes of Arkansas, and resolved to spend his days in perpetual exile. His letter of resignation to Mr. Speaker Call, is one of the most beautiful productions of the kind now in existence. At the time he resigned the robes of office, he had but just been married to a beautiful woman, one of the most respectable ladies of Tennessee. They had not been married but a few days, or weeks at least, before the lady repudiated her allegiance to her lord, and claimed the protection of her parents. The causes that led to the separation have never been unravelled to the world, and in all probability will perish with the wife and husband. Popular clamor and suspicion were warmly excited against Houston, and to avoid public opinion, as he himself said, he became an exile in Arkansas. Many allege that he was compelled, such was the excitement against him, to abandon Tennessee. After he had spent a year or two in Arkansas, he became engaged in some army contracts, which once more introduced him to the walks of civilized life—In consequence of the contracts, he was charged with fraud and peculation by Mr. William Stansberry, a member of Congress from Ohio. As soon as they reached the ears of Houston, he made his appearance in Washington, and taking the law into his own hands, flogged Stansberry in Pennsylvania Avenue. For this breach of "the privilege" he was arrested, and reprimanded at the Bar of the House, and another shade of darkness was added to his character. Although few could justify the course of Houston, few pitied poor Stansberry. He had most justly merited all he had received; but for all this, from the moment of the outrage until the commencement of the Texan war, Houston was looked upon by the American people as a base, a lost man. In 1833 he commenced the practice of law in Natchez; but soon abandoned that place for Texas. It is most probable that he had in view the conquest of that country, the moment he entered it. The rest needs not to be told."

Beaver Falls and Point.—Within the last few months, an unusual amount of real estate, in the vicinity of the Falls and Point, has changed hands, at prices, too, which have regularly advanced from day to day. Eastern and Northern capitalists are daily arriving and very few depart without investing more or less of their "surplus revenue" in real estate, on which they cannot fail realizing a handsome profit. Some can, already, out of a few hundreds invested, count their thousands. Water lots, and lots for store houses, and capacious dwellings, are selling rapidly, and the prices continually going up. Those who wish to secure a foothold in any of the half dozen active and beautiful villages on the Banks of the Beaver, should dip without delay, as they will have to pay double the amount which is now asked, before the expiration of six months.—"No mistake." Mark the prediction.—Brighton Gazette.

From the New Orleans Bee, June 10.

Hubbard, the person who set fire to the United States treasury department at Washington, was arrested in this city yesterday. He was traced to this place by an officer named Kelly, who suspecting that he would probably call at the Post Office for letters directed to a certain individual, communicated the same to the Postmaster, who caused him to be arrested the moment he presented himself. He confesses his guilt and promises to make known his accomplices.

General Houston and his staff have left for Texas, via Nachitoches.

As a proof that the affairs of Texas are restored to comparative tranquility, we have been informed by a letter dated Lynchburg, (Texas) 31st of May, that lands which previously could scarcely realise 1 dollar an acre, are now selling readily for 4 to 5. Speculation produced war, and will follow peace: but it is not yet very safe to invest capital in Texas lands.

Railways.—It is difficult to realize the immense advantages which have already accrued to mankind, from the introduction of steam Locomotives. In this country, where they are yet "few & far between," property is already greatly enhanced, and the facilities and rapidity of communication have increased to an enormous extent. And we may reasonably expect that in the course of ten years, when railroads will be established in every direction, when the face of the country will become reticulated, that the present order of things will be much altered, the costs of production will be much lessened, and all classes will reap the advantages which railroads will confer on a rich and fertile country, inhabited by active and enterprising men.—Merc. Jour.

A Strike in Taunton.—The usual quiet which reigns in our village was suddenly broken last week by a turn out among the furnace men, who paraded the streets, to the number of fifty, to the "sound of the stirring drum," for a considerable portion of the day. We understand that they struck work, not for higher wages, but because some of the Shamrock island had been put, as apprentices, in their establishment to learn the trade. Upon this invasion of these rights as American citizens, they took fire, threw down their ladies, and marched forth in order. Their employers have not yielded to their requisition, and the consequence has been, we believe, that they have sought and found employment elsewhere.—Reporter.

A refusal of praise, is a desire to be praised twice.—Rouchefoucault.

THE CREEK WAR.

We learn from the Columbus Sentinel 5th ult. that old Neah-Micco's camp was broken, and the hostile Indians are coming on the Hatchchubee, under Eneah Emathla, supposed to be from 1000 to 1500 strong.

The Alabama troops, it is said, are mustered into the United States service to claim the Indian war as an affair of theirs, and are determined to fight under the banner.

As the Anna Calhoun, which arrived Wednesday morning, was passing the mouth of the Hatchchubee or High Log Creek, from the Alabama shore informed them that Alabama troops, under Gen. Moore, had mustered and severe engagement with the Indians under Eneah Marthla the' morning, according to the informant, left them still fighting.

This as we received it, without vouching for its authenticity. A few days will confirm or dissipate the report.

We have the Charleston Patriot of the 6th ult. It gives an account of the expedition of Gen. Jessup to Tuskegee, and the following bulletin of a battle with the Indians, after which the dead at Fort Jones:—

"One of the most serious and desperate engagements that has happened since the commencement of the present war, took place three miles above Fort Jones on Thursday. About forty of the Gwinnett cavalry, under Capt. Garmony, were stationed at the house of Mr. Shepherd, the balance of the company being been detailed for some other service. About G. in the afternoon of that day had just dined, Col. Jernigan, who was then out on a scouting party, to assist him, in case he was attacked, at three o'clock in the evening fired upon a party at a short distance, which was supposed to be the engagement between the afore-mentioned scouting party and the Indians. Capt. Garmony immediately set off on foot with his forty men, and after proceeding about half a mile, discovered several Indians, who retreated towards a swamp to their main body, consisting of about 400. The whites advanced and attacked them, and a battle of more than two hours duration ensued. It was evident from the movements of the enemy, that their object was to out-flank and surround the command of Capt. Garmony, who ordered a retreat back to the house. The Indians pressed upon his men keeping up a constant fire, which was returned with the desperate courage of those who were determined to sell their lives as dear as possible. Nothing could have exceeded the bravery of this little band, though compelled to retreat, disputed every inch of ground, and sent many a tawney warrior to his last account. Capt. G. whose name will be remembered for his intrepid and daring conduct, slew three of his merciless assailants after he had retreated to the house, one of which after he himself had been shot down. His son, too, no less brave than himself, kept up a constant fire upon their pursuers, until the arrival of a reinforcement of about twenty men from Fort Jones, who charged the Indians, and rescued for the time the exhausted troops that had fought the first hard battle. This reinforcement, being however too small to contend with the overwhelming force of the enemy, were compelled to

ATKINSON'S SATURDAY EVENING POST.

PHILADELPHIA.

Saturday, July 2, 1836.

, Mr. H. K. H. has our thanks for the list of new subscribers sent us, but his letter is neither dated nor postmarked. Information as to the post office to which the papers are to be addressed, is indispensable.

OUR OWN AFFAIRS.

We intended to have made our appearance this day on a greatly enlarged sheet—but a trifling oversight has prevented it. Our new press on which the Post was to have been printed has not yet made its appearance from New York, although it was promised by the 20th of June. We hope to issue the S. E. Post of 16th inst. on the enlarged sheet.

THE NATIONAL ATLAS

Was to have made its appearance immediately after the enlarged S. E. Post. Its publication necessarily depends on that event, as we have not yet sufficient press machinery to issue both papers in addition to our regular work. We promise that No. 1 shall make its appearance the first week in August. It is of importance that persons disposed to patronize this new, cheap and elegant periodical should forward their names and address early, as we shall not print a large number of extra copies, to supply chance custom.

Mr. E. Burke Fisher, who has for several years assisted in the business department of this paper, and who has by attention to his duties, and correct deportment, won a large share of our esteem and confidence, has recently connected himself with the "New Yorker," and will hereafter be one of the publishers of that paper. Mr. Fisher carries industry and energy into the establishment, and will, we have no doubt, reap a commensurate reward, in the patronage of the reading community.

We wish him every success.

The Wandering Piper has been astonishing the natives at the Masonic Hall, as it has been done for benefits we forbear criticism.

DOGS.

The police have been most indefatigable in executing the existing ordinances for the destruction of all dogs found at large unmuzzled.—A great number of dogs have already yelped their last, and will bark at us no more as we pass them by. If any valuable dogs have been sacrificed with the common herd, it is entirely the fault of their some-time masters.

We are much grieved to state, that the police, in the faithful discharge of this duty, have been attacked. Some of the parties have been arrested, and held to bail in heavy amounts—and on Wednesday, Judge King, in the District Court, declared, that if the Mayor had held the parties to bail in double the amount, he should not have thought it too much—for that in this hot and unhealthy weather, a more important law was not in force; and he would vigorously support the officers engaged in discharging the duty of it.

IMPORTANT EXPERIMENT.

We have the pleasing duty to record this week, the most important and successful experiment which has been tried for many years. It is the application of anthracite to steam navigation.

Dr. Nott, of Union College, is the inventor, and in the benefit which he has conferred upon his country by this important discovery, he has crowned himself with a glorious wreath of fame, which, whilst American footsteps tread the banks of the mighty Hudson, shall be as lasting as its majestic waters.

This grand experiment was tested on Friday week, in the Steam Boat Novelty, (appropriately so named,) Capt. G. L. Seymour, in a trip from New York to Albany with the most complete success. The boat performing the distance against wind and tide with the utmost facility in 12 hours, without having added any thing to her fires for the last thirty miles of the trip. When we consider the many casualties to which our present steam boats are exposed—the awful calamity which has so recently happened, involving the loss of lives to the most frightful extent, and turn to this contrivance which secures to the passengers entire immunity from any danger from the apparatus. We scarcely know how to speak in any measured terms of a discovery so important. This alone would entitle Dr. Nott to our warmest gratitude, but this is not all—the saving in expenditure will be immense, giving it is stated, upon the Hudson river, a profit in a single season of from $15 to $18,000. It will, again, tend to enrich Pennsylvania most materially, as the chief part of the fuel used will be supplied from this state, but this, though of course, extremely gratifying to us, is a matter of minor consideration as regards the best utility of the measure.

Hitherto the chief objection to using steam boats at sea for long voyages, has been the impossibility of taking a sufficient quantity of fuel to supply the demands of the vessel, this is now obviated, a sufficient quantity may be taken to visit the old world, as we should take a mere pleasure trip and to return as to our acquaintances almost before we have been missed.—Old time the hoary conqueror is robbed of half his attributes—our lives are doubled in the opportunities thus given to us to accomplish projects which would have previously taken us twice a life to achieve, it has made us smile at space, and consider the ocean a span.

As it is fashionable to give all the news, sayings and doings at Washington, we take the liberty to avail ourselves of the spirited narration, or a brief sketch of it, we received TETE-A-TETE from a fair friend of ours, who has just returned from the Capitol. The Washington letter writers, however, need feel no fear that they are to be out done in scandal. Even though a lady speaks. Nothing can exceed their gossip.

Leaving here on Friday morning, at 6 o'clock, the same evening our fair friend was listening to a speech from Henry Wise, in the Hall of Representatives. "Wise was thundering away on the Harbour Bill, talking of old Virginia—her principles and her poverty—of Kentucky, Henry Clay, &c. On another occasion he deplored the Indian wrongs, denounced and with the severest invectives the late commissioners, Georgians, &c." Our friend was much pleased with the Virginia orator. His scarcasms, she thought most "withering, cutting and severe, and nothing could excel the freedom and daring, with which he uttered them, bit who, or where they might." "Wise has a loud and strong voice, easily making himself heard, and a good deal listened to." This latter fact, considering how often the gentleman is before the House, would seem to show he possessed talents and powers of no common order. We were particular to enquire after Wise, as his bold and fearless course in the early part of the session, had very much interested us, and the Washington letter writers, who had then latched him so much, have latterly almost ceased to speak of him, and we thought he might have fallen into bad repute. But Wise, we are assured is still decidedly, one of the Washington Lions. "He is of middle stature, but very spare and thin, with blue eyes and light hair, but still with a countenance capable of expressing strong feelings and passions, and on these, his feelings and passions, he much relies for his promptings, nay, for whatever he says, and is accordingly not unfrequently betrayed to the expression of language and sentiments, that had better not have been expressed, and which gives him the character even with his friends, of being very indiscreet."

Several other speakers were heard, Messrs. Adams, Granger, &c., the latter a fine looking man, spoke in a dignified parliamentary style, and in an audible clear good voice. Others again were not heard by our fair friend, but their orations were described, and in a manner to excite great curiosity to listen to them.—Among these thus designated was Mr. Paten, of Tennessee, who it seems has displayed on several occasions high powers of eloquence.—We will venture however to propose the name of another who has been of late little heard of—too little—than whom a more eloquent or a sounder stronger man cannot be named from the list of members occupying seats in the Hall of Representatives, viz. Thomas Corwin, of Ohio.—He is a man of high powers of intellect, and some of his forensic eloquence which we have listened to, we have never heard surpassed.—Among the first of the promising growing men of the West, we would name Mr. Corwin. And this opinion we doubt not, little as Mr. Corwin has lately said in Congress, would be sustained by a majority of those with whom he acts.

Among the Senators to whom our fair friend had the pleasure of listening were Mr. Clay and Southard, in reference to whom particularly the former, all was commendation. But then there was Niles and Walker. "Execrable was the expression." How is it that Walker who went from Pennsylvania to Mississippi but a few years since, a poor and needy adventurer, and is said to have obtained both fortune and place—certainly the latter succeeded so far without the "gift of the gab," for all seem to deny him any one of the requisites of a good public speaker, either voice, manner or grace? And yet it was understood to be by means of the stump that he bought up the golden opinions of the good people of Mississippi. And these have listened in their time to their Adams's, Reeds, Poindexters, and men of real eloquence.

"Of the ladies," continued our fair narrator, "there was Mrs. Judge White, the most fascinating and accomplished woman, (and concluding the sentence with a woman's usual climax the ne plus ultra of a woman's praise,) I could love her. She talked so well, and was so graceful and lady like, and though she is not so youthful as she has been, nor perhaps quite so beautiful, still the woman's reign is not over with her yet, even if she would rule with the sceptre of Venus instead of that of Minerva, which so well becomes her, and which she evidently gives preference to."

Mrs. Gen. Ashley too, is a most delightful lady, and one of the most esteemed, respected and popular at Washington." "Half all men's hearts are hers." She is a native of the west, and patronises all western folks, herself and her carriage being always at their command, and a better patroness they could not have since from the white house to the Senate, her name is a sure passport and always the most flattering introduction. Mrs. Florida White, still continues in the ascendant, and hardly rivalled by any thing but her own beautiful portrait, which with her husband's is hanging in the library.—"Miss Calhoun so like her father, but yet so very delicate." But we must not enumerate.

As to places, the view from the Capital is represented at this time, as being most splendid: the whole surrounding country appearing in its richest drapery. The grounds about the President's House, are most tastefully and elegantly laid out, and the old Hero gave our friend and her party, a very kind and gallant reception.

But we must close our "table talk" which we have only set down, because, it pleased and amused us for an half hour, but which we cannot guarantee it will do for others, since in our mode of serving it up, has lost that spirit and point which the fair narrator better than any one else could give it.

COMMON COUNCIL OF NEW YORK.

We little thought when we first called the attention of our readers to the ludicrous situation of the body without a head, that we should still have to record a tale of its existence in statu quo. There was a time, when the head was off, the body would die. But here is a body, as lively and vigorous as ever, without a head, and no very immediate prospect of getting one. To be serious, however, this is carrying the joke a little too far, that the dogged determination of 16 men, should act as a dead weight upon all business necessary to be enacted, to the inconvenience and serious evil of a large community, is something too much of a good thing. It is all very well, and mighty fine, to be resolved, but there is such a thing as paying too dear for one's whistle.

THE TRIAL OF SPROGELL, WILLIAMS, AND BOON, FOR HIGHWAY ROBBERY.

This important trial came on in the District Court this week—Fowler who was a prisoner on the former trial was admitted State's evidence on this occasion. St. George Campbell, and Mr. Doran conducted the case for the commonwealth, and David Paul Brown, Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Humphreys, for the accused—at 6 o'clock on Wednesday the case for the prosecution closed—Mr. Humphries opened the case for the defence, Mr. Kennedy spoke very forcibly in behalf of Sprogell. We abstain in the present state of the affair from entering more particularly into the matter still on trial, but shall next week give our readers the substance of it.

The Great increase of trade to the West.—The Cleveland Herald complains bitterly of the delay in getting their goods through from New York by Buffalo. The cause is that the means of transport are not adequate to the trade, and the shipping and the steamers on Lake Erie must be increased. There are at this time constantly 100 cargoes or more collected at Buffalo for want of vessels.

LAWS IN ST. LOUIS. MO.

Upon some of the parties concerned in the horrible and savage act of burying a man alive—the jury have decided that as some thousands were concerned in the outrage, it would be impossible to proceed against a few. The Transcript asks these jurors whether if a gang of burglars were to break into either of their houses, and one of the lot only chanced to be taken, that juror would proceed against him—undoubtedly he would—he would not say—you are a shameful villain, you have broken into my house and stolen my property, but as there were others who were also concerned in the affair, I let you off, go! No! he would on the contrary say I've caught one at least, and I will make him an example to the rest. The cases are perfectly parallel, and there is no backing out. The laws must be openly, honestly, and fearlessly upheld, or they become a farce, and the halls of justice a SOLEMN mockery.

MORRIS MATTSON.

The Inquirer of this city states that our fellow townsman, Morris Mattson is about to make a visit to Texas and Mexico, where he will pass the summer and ensuing winter. We wish him every happiness on his tour, and shall have much pleasure in seeing an account of his travels.

THEATRICAL.

Madame Celeste has continued to bring good houses at this late season of the year to the Chesnut street Theatre. She has appeared in a new character, Yelva, in which she was quite successful. It is said that she has engaged at her own expense some talented vocalists from the old world, in order to produce ballet operas.—No doubt they will tell—too much pantomine tires.

At the Walnut Street our favourites have been appearing before us one by one appealing to us with their benefits—for the most part—once only in a season—and they have been well answered. Mrs. Willis par excellence the Kelly of the stage provided us a rich feast on Monday both in novelty and in the excellence of her own acting. Mr. Murdoch has taken a second benefit in consequence of not being able to play again in Philadelphia for some time.

Dowton has made a great hit in Boston.

The Terman's are in Canada—Herr Cline proceeds there shortly.

Mrs. Hamblin is successful with her new Theatre in New York.

Andrew Prunty or Prentiss, from the county of Farmini, Ireland, was lately killed near Batavia—he was on his way to purchase land in Michigan. Having about $500 in his possession of which only 100 was found, and the remainder is therefore supposed to be in his trunk which has not yet been discovered.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE S. E. POST.

WASHINGTON, June 29th, 1836.

Dear Sir—I have the honor again to address you from the cloudy tabernacle. We have had another long, dull, dirty storm, half rain, half mist, which neither as night tempt a hypochondriac, to hang himself. Cold enough to make a fire very agreeable; think of a fire the last of June in this latitude! I have had one and felt it quite comfortable. If I had been a man of very acute sensibility, I should have shot myself up from the sight of my fellow creatures, for hearing the complaints of the ladies, at being kept in, and the grumbling of the men at having to go out, my feelings of sympathy were kept in constant action. The long cadaverous faces I met in the street—dingy mass through mist and rain, reminded me of the illustrations of Dante's Inferno. The giant forms, bent to an angle of 45 degrees, grasping their umbrellas, and hurrying past each other, "without a word or kindly sign," roughly resembled those described in "Vathek," in the hall of the infernals.—The people begin to grow quite wolfish, I hear of daily quarrels and feel rejoiced that the session is so nearly at an end, or I might be compelled to recount some scenes as disgraceful as some that took place a short time since. Somebody said "the best of friends must part," they had better change it to "the best of friends must quarrel," for some quarrels have taken place (political ones I mean,) between gentlemen who have hitherto stood back to back, and shoulder to shoulder.

The great parties seem again to have broken up, and like the Arctic ocean after a tempest, the floes are widely floating about, uncertain of their present position and destination. The sun possibly—the tide of public opinion, has carried all before it, as it always must and will, but should the wind shift, the consequences. Private discussions, that are not obtruded on the public, are and ought to be held sacred from the hands of the letter writer, so I forbear to mention them, but when they are before every body like the sparring of Messrs. Mann and Vanderpool, of New York, they become public property. Mr. Mann was replying to some of the tirades of Mr. Wise, (which to be sure was a very idle thing of any gentleman, who had any thing else to do,) and Mr. Vanderpool desired him rather roughly "not to say any thing to disgrace the delegation." Mr. Mann replied that he thought that the delegation was in much greater danger of being disgraced by some matter then in hand, then by any thing he was saying, upon the adjournment in high dudgeon, and high words ensued, and what direful catastrophe might have taken place, is terrible to think of, but "consideration like an angel came," and reminded the delegation of what they could better spare a better man, so the dignitaries addressed them in the spirit, at least of Shakspeare, "be friends ye New York fools, be friends, we have Southern quarrels enow if you could tell how to reckon." So the matter as far as I have heard passed over.

In the Senate on Monday, the amendment to the Post Office Bill, as relates to the boxes, put up and placed in the Post Offices, was under consideration, Messrs. Davis and Buchanan, offered amendments to the bill, regulating the prices &c. of the boxes, which were negatived. The bill with the amendment prevously made was then read a third time.

The message of the President, with his veto, to the bill fixing permanently the adjournment of Congress came up, and was postponed to Monday.

About twenty bills from the House, principally relief bills, were then read a third time and passed.

The bill to increase the military establishment of the United States, then came up, and after some conversation and striking out, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

In the House on Tuesday, the principal business that was finished, was passing the bill for altering the organization of the Post-office.

On the bill for the organization of the Navy coming up, Mr. Southard entered into some explanations of the principles on which it was constructed, and stated that as the Navy now stood, boys entering as midshipmen and behaving well, become in process of time captains, though there was no law by which they were appointed. That children at the breast, had been known to be appointed midshipmen, and sometimes men of 24 or 25 years were entered. The committee thought it better to regulate by law the age at which boys should enter the Navy, and had fixed it between the ages of 14 and 18. It also provided that the boys should be selected as equally as possible from all the states in the Union, in proportion to their representation. He went on to explain the necessity for creating in our Navy the grades of admirals, vice admirals and rear admirals, and paid a handsome compliment to the officers of the Navy.

Mr. Buchanan was opposed to taking up so important a bill, with the idea of acting on it, so late in the season, he thought it incumbent upon the Senate to give it a longer and more cool consideration, than was possible now to do, and to test the sense of the Senate, moved to lay the bill on the table which motion was carried, yeas 12, nays 15. Several bills were ordered to a third reading, and after some Executive business the Senate adjourned.

The House of Representatives on Tuesday, was solely engaged in carrying through the Deposite Bill, or the Division Bill or whatever it is called, which it did by an immense majority, the vote being yeas 155, nays 19. The President, it was generally thought, would refuse to sign it, but the majority was so large that he did not hesitate.

On Wednesday in the House, the Land Bill, or rather the bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the states was taken up, and on motion of Mr. Hawes, was laid on the table. The bill to change the organization of the Post Office, receive it from the Senate with amendments, was referred to the committee on the Post Office. The House then passed nine or ten bills from the Senate of a private nature, and then took up the Appropriation Bill, or that clause of it relative to the Delaware river, &c. &c. The members "remarked" and disputed on the appropriation for that and other rivers, till the House adjourned.

On Tuesday after some private business, the House took up the Post Office Bill in committee of the whole, some of the amendments of the Senate were agreed to, others refused, after debating on the subject till the hour for the special order of the day, they laid it by and took up the Harbor Bill, on which they debated till half past two, when they went to dinner.

In the Senate on Friday, a message was received from the President, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, relative to the state of affairs in Texas, and stating that he had taken measures to get more information. On motion of Mr. Clay, the report and papers accompanying were ordered to be printed and made the order of the day for Tuesday next. Various reports were received from the committees and some private business, the bill for the organization of the Navy was taken up, and occupied the Senate for the remainder of the day. Finally the bill was amended to suit them, and provided for one admiral, one vice admiral, and three rear admirals, after which it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

In Senate on Friday, eighty bills were read a second time, and ordered to a third reading, all relief bills. They were then read a third time, by their titles and passed.

The House, on Saturday took up the bills making appropriations for the District of Columbia, and other matters connected therewith, which occupied the time till the hour fixed for the further consideration of the harbor bill, which occupied the House till half past 2 o'clock, when they took their recess.

A duel took place here this week between two young men, midshipmen in the navy. I do not know what led to the quarrel, and shall not give surmises, what I know I will tell you. The difference occurred at Norfolk, Mr. Key accusing Mr. Sherburne of cowardice. They determined to settle their quarrel in the district, which seems a privileged place for such things a sort of "Alsatia." I do not know how long Mr. Key had been in the city before the fatal rencontre, but Mr. Sherburne had been here about 4 fortnight, they went out privately with their seconds, both of whom I believe were young physicians. On the ground just inside the State of Maryland, Mr. Sherburne said he should be satisfied if Mr. Key would retract the terms coward, but Mr. Key said he did not go there to retract, but to fight. The first fire both missed. I am informed that Mr. Sherburne again said that he had no wish to injure Mr. Key, and if he would say that he did not mean that he was a coward he should be satisfied; again Mr. Key said he would not retract, and that one of them must die. At the second fire he received the ball of his antagonist through the body. He lived about half an hour. I know little of Mr. Key, but Mr. Sherburne is an amiable good tempered young man, who was probably forced into the conflict by the knowledge that he would be pressed by his comrades, and ruined in his professional career if he sat down tamely under the insult. It is unfortunate that such things should take place with such complete impunity, but while examples are set by the highest men in the nation, going out on the most trifling vocations, with what face can they punish those who follow in their path. There was much been said and written against dueling, but no step will be put to the practice, while it is considered disgraceful to decline a challenge, or put up with an affront. If the penalty was such disgrace that no man would submit to it, or could be ridiculed for refusing to risk, it might prevent this insane practice, but how can we expect our legislators to make laws against themselves? I hope to see the day when the candidates for Congress, will be called on among other pledges to promise their utmost exertions to pass a law that will prevent these meetings.

The Hall of Representatives presents the greatest scene of confusion at present that I ever witnessed, the members do not seem to know what they would be at themselves, and people go to the evening session to see the fun, much as they go to the theatre. Very little of what is said can be distinguished in the gallery, and it is almost useless to go with the hope of hearing.

In the Senate on Tuesday, (having nothing else to do, one would suppose,) they took up the scrutinizing resolutions of Mr. Benton, but I have not heard what they done with them.

The House have been engaged these two or three days back on the harbor bill.

We are now and then blessed with a glance of the sun, just enough to prevent our forgetting what it looks like, but not enough to dispel the vapours of the atmosphere, or the brain. To tell the truth we are becoming a very dirty people, the wash-women are scolding and clamouring like a flock of gulls, and the bachelors are beginning to look like bears, the ladies in despair, paper collars are getting quite in repute, and every thing looks dull, but the pigs, they enjoy themselves amazingly—an old lady swine with a free progeny has taken possession of a new mud-puddle before my windows, and seems as happy as the day is long, there stands a man at this moment looking at her with such a lackadaisical air, that I can fancy he is saying, "you dont want a clean shirt, confound you!"

COMMUNICATION.

STAMMERING CURED, BY DR. COMSTOCK.

Mr. Editor—Having experienced, to a very painful extent, the many deprivations necessarily and peculiarly connected with inveterate stammering, to which I have been subject from early life, I am anxious that my acknowledge the restoration that has been effected to my case, under the instruction of Dr. Comstock. Knowing, as I well do, how valuable such a communication would have once been to me, I am induced to pen this for the benefit of others.

My articulation, until very lately, was so embarrassing and difficult, as to have, in a very great degree, shut out from me the pleasures of conversation. I could scarcely articulate a single sentence without considerable effort on my part, and apparent anxiety and pain to others. I therefore seldom spoke from choice, and even avoided when possible, the necessity of doing so. I am, however, no longer subjected to these severe deprivations, but so relieved from them that I can now converse with friends or strangers, and feel confident of my power to do so.

Many years ago, and at some expense and trouble, I sought out Mr. Chapman, a teacher then of considerable notoriety, and placed myself immediately under his care. Of him I do not complain, but notice the fact as part of my experience. Those who are aware of his pretensions, know how impossible it is here to compare the peculiarities of his plan with the principles of my last tutor's, whose system, however, I should unhesitatingly prefer.

To Western and Southern Merchants.

THE great properties of Dorrbee's Bowel Complaint, and Cholera Antidote, in the South and West, particularly upon the shores of the Western waters, and the great rapidity and rapid progress of these diseases, renders it an object of great importance to be provided with a medicine which may be relied upon as an efficient and speedy remedy. DR. BAKER'S SPECIFIC is offered to the public, as the DECIDEDLY SUPERIOR REMEDY, having been used in upwards of TWENTY THOUSAND CASES, with almost invariable success, the proprietor confidently recommends it as the most certain, efficacious and prompt remedy ever used for the above diseases.

It has never been known to fail to cure a Diarrhoea, if promptly administered either to children or adults, in a very short time, and will be found particularly serviceable when administered at the commencement of the Bowel Complaint, which usually commences with a Diarrhoea. Individuals and families will find it advantageous to be supplied with a bottle in case of sudden attacks. Price 25 cents.

PAINTERS' PROFUSION.—Pay thou the painter in the day that thou owest him, that the evil day may be afar off, lest the good man of the law wendeth thee thy bill: greeting.

Remember him of the quill, and the devils around him, and when thou weddest thy daughter to a man of her choice, send thou unto him a bountiful slice of the bridal loaf.

Borrow not that for which thy neighbor hath paid, but go and buy for thyself of him who hath to sell.

Thou shalt not read thy neighbor's paper, nor molest him in the peaceful possession of it, lest thou stand condemned in the sight of him who driveth the quill, and thy character be hawked about by poor children.—Anon.

A JUVENILE YANKEE TRICK.—In the village of New Bedford, (says the Providence Herald,) the boys were in the habit of playing at ball. A cross-grained old chap, who kept a crockery store was somewhat annoyed by the juvenile sport; and whenever a ball came in his way would seize upon it, take it into his store, and clap it into the stove without ceremony. A few days since, having made a prime one of the offensive articles in question, and adjusted his usual snooze, he soon found he had 'caught a Tartar.' A horrible explosion took place—the stove was blown 'sky high'—the store was shattered with the shock—and about forty dollars worth of crockery was dashed in pieces. It is unnecessary to add, that the urchins, who had so often been interrupted in their sports by 'sourcrop' had charged their ball with gunpowder, by way of a practical hint to the old fellow to let them alone in future.

MATRIMONIAL ANECDOTE.—About a century ago, when clergymen were not so plenty as they are now, a young gentleman and his damsel were anxiously awaiting the happy day, which was to see them united in the silken bonds of matrimony. They resided on the north side of Mission river, and the clergyman who had been engaged to tie the knot, lived on the south side of this river.

As the Fates would have it, heavy rains fell in the night previous to the nuptial day, which rendered the little river impassable. Its waters were rising, and its current becoming more rapid every hour.—The clergyman arrived at the time appointed at a point where he had been in the habit of fording the river; but it was so much as his life was worth to attempt to ford it, on this occasion. He turned his horse's head to return, when he was hailed by two voices on the opposite side of the stream—they were those of the bride and groom who engaged him to stay.—After some debate it was agreed that the ceremony should proceed.

In the mean time the friend of the betrothed arrived from the bride's house in the neighborhood. Then was presented a singular spectacle, 'the like whereof was never seen before,' and probably will not be again. The domine read the marriage service on the margin of the river, while the parties stood on the opposite side.

After the ceremony was over, the groom tossed a few guilders across the creek, which the domine picked up and pocketed as his fee, mounted his horse and proceeded homeward, and the married couple did the same.—Ohio Journal.

ARISTOCRATIC PRIDE.—Among all the varied forms and phases which pride exhibits itself to the public, there is none more disgusting and ridiculous than the aristocratic or dandied form which it assumes in the persons of those who seem to consider it an indignity to be even labouring with their hands, or performing any of the drudgeries of life: They think it adds the dignity of a gentleman, in which character they would like to be considered, to add their delicate fingers with mean employments, as they would call such employment as most men engage in to earn, with honesty, their daily bread. These men of search, and ruffles, and bergamot, would look upon it as an everlasting disgrace to be surprised by their correspondent acquaintance in the act of rolling a wheel-barrow through the streets, in the transaction of necessary business, as the immortal Franklin used to do through the streets of Philadelphia, or in carrying provisions from the market, or in tilling the land. This foolish pride is often a heavy tax, levied upon the purse of its possessor, for, often do we see such a person, in order to keep up appearances, expending his money, and depriving himself almost to starvation, and to every domestic inconvenience, to prevent his pride being mortified, and to support his fancied dignity. Such dandied lops are the most unenviable of society, as generally speaking the gilded butterfly which hovers about the flowers in the sunshine of summer, but is swept away by the cold blasts of autumn.

REMARKABLE ANECDOTE.

The particulars of the following very striking incident was lately told us by a friend, as a fact, falling within the range of his personal knowledge; and having the most perfect confidence in his veracity, we scruple not to give it as such to our readers.—In a seaport town on the western coast of England, some years ago, there was notorious gloom of a sermon being preached on Sunday evening, in a dissenting chapel there. The preacher was a man of great celebrity in his calling; and the circumstance, together with the main object of the discourse—to enforce the duty of a strict observance of the Sabbath—attracted an overflowing audience. After the usual prelatory of prayer and hymn of praise, the preacher announced the text, and was about to proceed with the sermon, when he suddenly paused, leaned his head on the pulpit, and remained silent a few moments. It was imagined that he had become embarrassed; but he soon recovered himself, and, addressing the congregation, said, that before entering upon his discourse, he begged to narrate to them a short anecdote.—"It is now exactly twelve months ago," said he, "since I was within reeling place of worship; and the occasion was, as many here may probably remember, the same as that which has now brought us together. Amongst those who came into the chapel this evening, were three young men, who came not only with the intent of insulting and mocking the venerable pastor, but even with stones in their pockets to throw at him as he stood in his pulpit. According, they had not lingered long to the end of course, when one of them said, impatiently, 'why need we listen any longer to the blockhead—throw!' but the second stopped him saying, 'let us see what he makes of this point.' The curiosity of the latter was not so sooner satisfied, than he too, cried "Aye, confound him, it is only what I expected—throw now!"—But here the third interposed, and said it would be better altogether to give up the design which had brought them there. At this remark the two associates took offence, and left the church, while he himself remained. 'Now, say he to himself, perhaps I should see the preacher, with much emotion, "what were afterwards the several fates of these young men. The first was hanged many years ago at Tyburn, but the crime of legacy, the second is now living, a transported felon for life for murder, in the jail of the city. The third, my brethren"—and the speaker's agitation here became excessive, while he paused, and wiped large drops from his brow—"the third, I am sorry to say, he who is now about to address you—listen to him!"

Hotel.—The covering worn by the body or mind: in the former case hiding nature, and in the latter revealing her.

Happiness.—The health of the mind, produced by its virtuous exercise. They who would attain it otherwise may search for the word Will-o'-the-Wisp.

Haunch of venison.—That with which the demon of gout and gluttony baits his hook.

Hemp.—A hellborne excrescence, used for hanging a hat on, taking snuff with, shaking, or nodding; or as a target which they who know its value offer to be shot at for a shilling a day.

Health.—Another word for temperance and exercise.

Hemp.—The neckcloth, alias nec-quid which rogues put on when they are company for the last time.

Holidays.—The alpinets of our horizon; perhaps the only one of our life. Of this truth Amazanghina seems to have been aware. Being asked by the people of Lampsacus before his death whether he would any thing to be done in commemoration of him. "Yes," he replied, "let the boys be allowed to play on the anniversary of my death."

Hope.—A compensation for the realities of life, most enjoyed by those who have the least to lose, since they are generally rendered much happier by expectation than they would be by possession.

Hypochondria.—The imaginary malady with which those are taxed who have no real one.

Idol.—Whatever worship in their own shape who would be shocked at doing it to any other.

Immortality.—Of modern authors.—Drawing in imagination upon the future for that homage which the present age refuses to pay. At best a protested obligation.

Indisposition, Industry.—Two words which were never before found united.

Infancy.—A mysterious meteor sent to us from the invisible world, into which, after performing the evolutions incidental to the seven ages of man, it will finally return.

Judge, Jury.—A compound legal machine, somewhat resembling a clock—the latter exhibiting twelve numbers, and giving warning to the former, before he can strike, or indicate the hour at which a criminal is to die.

Knowledge.—A molehill removed from the mountain of our ignorance.

Laughter.—A faculty bestowed exclusively upon man and which there is therefore a sort of impiety in not exercising as frequently as we can. We may say with Titus, that we have lost a day if it have passed without our laughing. The pilgrims at Mecca consider it as essential a part of their devotion, that they call upon the Prophet to preserve them from sad faces.

Lark.—The matin chorister, that first sees the light of heaven to music.

Learning.—Too often a knowledge of words and an ignorance of things; a mere act of memory which may be exercised without common sense.

Legume.—A dye much used in the manufacture of wine.

Labyrinth.—The Law.

Longevity.—Adding a few years to the wrong end of life, and surviving oneself.

Love.—Thought to only earth, and genius of chaosos where you are certain to lose your money.

Lover.—One who in his desire to obtain possession of another, has lost possession of himself.

Marbe.—That which all lovers have produced in about equal proportions: so much sooner is it to die for religion than to live for it.

Marriage.—Taking a yoke-fellow, who may lighten the burden of existence if you pull together, or render it insupportable if you drag different ways.

May.—"I had rather live twenty Mays," says Sir Thomas Wotten, "than forty Decembers;" and yet in his old age he was anxious to prolong the winter of his days—

"And from the dregs of life thought to receive
What the first sprightly running would not give."

Melancholy.—Ingratitude to Heaven.

Milk, City. The joint production of the cow and the pump.

Nose.—See Snuff-box.

Nonsense.—Generally applied to any sense that happens to suffer from our own.

A POLITE SEA ROBBER.

We often read of extremely polite and gentlemanly highwaymen, who rob with such marvellous courtesy, that a man can hardly feel it in his heart to withhold his watch, his purse, or ought of goods and chattles that he may chance to have about him. But it is quite otherwise with your sea robbers, alias pirates, who are represented as a most brutal and unbeloved set, who have not the least dash of politeness about them, to redeem their characters from unmitigated odium. Such being their general reputation, it is with no slight feeling of relief that we read the account of so polished and courteous a villain, as the one described below. It is extracted from the "Adventures of a Wanderer." He had shipped at New Orleans, on board the Government schooner, bound to Havana and Liverpool, as steward. We get (says he) under way, and proceeded down the river until we came to a place called the English Turn, when a boat, manned by twelve or fourteen men, came off from the shore and when they had arrived within hail, they called to us, and asked if we wanted a pilot. The captain answered, "No;" whereupon the man in the stern of the boat ordered one of the men to throw him a rope. The rope was handed him, and it being made fast to the boat, he came alongside. He ascended the ladder, and came on board with all his men, excepting four, who remained in the boat. The captain of these descerned one was a tall man, dark complexioned, and terrible in aspect. His eyes were black and piercing, his nose slightly Roman, and wore a huge pair of sable mustachios. His mien wore a lofty and lordly air, handsome and too burnt. He saluted the captain in a courteous manner, and was profuse in compliments. His men, who wore long, red Indian stockings, red caps, and were armed with pistols and knives, scattered carelessly about the deck. The pirate captain asked our captain where he was bound, he answered correctly, "To Liverpool, via Havana." Our captain then cut short the interrogatories of the pirate, by saying, "I know your business." The pirate then turned to our crew, and asked them what sort of usage they had received since they left Europe. "Tolerable," they replied, "with the very little grog." The pirate then called for the steward. I made my appearance. "Have you plenty of grog on board?" inquired he. I replied in the affirmative. "Fill up that bucket," said he, "and carry it down in the forecastle, for the men to drink." I took up the bucket at which he pointed, carried it into the cabin, and filled it with liquor. I then took it forward to the forecastle, where the men received it, and conveyed it below. As soon as the crew had got below, and were assembled around the bucket, the pirate placed two of his men upon the scuttle to prevent any of the crew from coming on deck, while he with two of his gang stuck close to the captain and mate. "Now, steward," said the pirate, "go down and invite all your messmates to come on deck." I did as I was ordered. Our messmates were a lady and two small children, and a gentleman who had been engaged in teaching a school in New Orleans, but having received a letter purporting that the death of a near relation had left him heir to a large fortune, had embarked for his home, which was London. These persons came on deck. The lady was much frightened, but the pirate told her to be under no apprehension, and soothed her with language which would not have disgraced the court of Great Britain. The pirate now gave orders to bring up the gentleman's trunk. The trunk was laid at his feet. "Now," said he, "bring up the captain and mate's property." Many chests were produced. He then proceeded to overhaul the captain's trunk, which continued "no great shakes." "Captain, you have a very poor kit!" said he, with a scornful smile.

The pirate then examined the passenger's trunk. It contained about four hundred and forty dollars in specie. In rummaging the trunk, the pirate fell in with the letter containing the information in respect to the fortune which had been left the passenger. This letter the pirate read, and giving a significant smile at the fortunes of man, folded it anew, folded it up carefully and laid it down. He then turned to the captain, and asked him if the man had paid his passage. "No," answered the captain. "How much does his passage cost?" inquired the pirate. "Two hundred and twenty dollars," replied the captain. "That you must lose," said the pirate. Then turning to the passenger—"You," said he, "I will treat fairly! You will want," cont nued the pirate, "when you arrive in Liverpool, two dollars to pay the porter for carrying your trunk;" he laid down the money; "your passage to London will cost you 32 10s;" he counted it out and placed it with the two dollars; your dinner will come to five shillings, and you may want 2s more to treat some of your friends." he laid down the money with the rest, "and the loss of your trunk will be sufficient, here are twenty five more." He presented the amount of these several items to the passenger, gave the remainder to one of his gang, and the tall man, as soon as he came into the boat. He then courteously asked the time of day. The captain pulled out a fine watch, and answered that it was half past three. "Your watch takes my fancy mightily," said the pirate, and taking it from the captain, he put it into his fob with great nonchalance, and walked away to the forecastle "Come up here two of you who are sober," said he. Two of them stumbled up, and the rest come reeling after. "Go down into the cabin, and bring me up all the small arms you can find," said the pirate. The two first sailors went down, and soon returned with an old fowling piece and a pair of pistols. "Are," said he, turning to the sailors, "if any of you, boys, wish to change your situation for better or for worse, or shorter passage, I will give you a chance; for rent I am after, and rent I'll have! Rent, stop!" cried he, "this lady I had almost forgotten; come here, madam, and let me hear a little of your worldly concerns." She immediately commenced an eloquent harangue, accompanied with tears. She had gone on for some time in this manner, when the pirate unceremoniously cried, "Avast! avast! there, that's enough, I'd sooner face the battery of ninety-eights, than stand the fire of your eloquent tongue." He then ordered some brandy for himself and his men. The liquor was brought; I poured out a glassful for him, when he said, "Stop! again, I just be so good as to drink the health of your sailor you a manners. I don't know what you Yankee inventors may have put into this liquor. You may have thrown an onyx in the cup." The captain drank it off coolly. The pirate eyed the captain closely for a few moments, and then said to his followers, "Come, my boys, we may ventute," and the decanter was soon drained of its contents. The pirate then proceeded to the cabin, and requested the captain to take a walk up that way. "And you Mr. Mate," said he, "begin to travel up the lore rigging. But mind!" said he, "stop when I tell you." The captain and mate had proceeded half way up the lower rigging, when he commanded them to halt. The captain was about stepping upon the next rattling, when the pirate again hailed them—"If you stir an inch both of you, or a step forwards," said he, "you will come down faster than you went up." The captain looked down and saw several pistols levelled at him, ready to be discharged at him on the slightest motion. He then remained stationary. Then the pirate taking off his cap, addressed the passengers. He told them he was once poor himself, and therefore knew how to sympathise with persons in distress. He hoped they would be grateful for the lenity which he had shown them, and then wishing them a pleasant voyage, he stepped over the side into his boat, and was soon lost to our view beneath the foliage of the thick underwood which lined the shore and hung over the green wave.

NAVAL REMINISCENCE.

"All of which I saw, part of which I was."

In the year 1804, when Preble, as Commodore of the American squadron in the Mediterranean, was gaining glory, before Tripoli, like for himself his princes and crews, and for his country, Lieut. Commdt. Richard Somers, had command under him, of the Nautilus, a schooner of 14 guns.

During the seven al fights which had previously occurred with the enemy, this officer had shown great bravery as commander of gun-boat No. 1; and, now, suggested to the Commodore that a nap y result might, possibly, be obtained, by converting the ketch, Intrepid, a captured craft of about 75 tons—the identical vessel with which the gallant Decatur had boarded, recaptured, and burned the frigate Philadelphia—into a fire-ship, and sending her into the harbor under the walls of the Bashaw's castle, in direct contact with the entire marine force of the Tripolitanes.

This daring and highly dangerous enterprise being determined upon, Somers, with whom it had originated, received the orders—to which he was thus entitled—to conduct it; and the necessary preparations were promptly made by him. Fifteen thousand pounds of powder were first placed loosely in the hold of the ketch, and upon this two hundred and fifty thirteen-inch, fixed shells, with a train attached from the cabin and fore peak. Only one officer, the talented and lamented Lieutenant Henry Wadsworth—brother of the present Commodore Wadsworth—was to accompany him, and four volunteer seamen were to compose his crew.

All things were now in readiness, except the selection of the men—for it came to this, at last, every man on board the Nautilus having volunteered for the service. This done, it was determined, without delay, to attempt the enterprise—to succeed in it, or perish.

Two nights successively did the Intrepid move; but owing to light and baffling winds, nothing could be accomplished. These failings, and an unusual movement in the harbor after dark on the third night, led Somers to believe that the suspicions of the enemy had been excited, and that they were on the look out. It was the general impression, that their powder was nearly exhausted; and as so large a quantity as was on board the ketch, if captured, would greatly tend to protract the contest, before acting off, he addressed his crew upon the subject, telling them "that no man need accompany him, who had not come to the resolution to blow himself up, rather than be captured; and that such was fully his own determination!"

Three cheers was the only reply. The gallant crew rose, as a single man, with a resolution of yielding up their lives, sooner than surrender to their enemies: while each seized forth, and bound his kerch, that he might be permitted to apply the match! It was a glorious moment, and made an impression on the hearts of all witnessing it, never to be forgotten.

All then took leave of every officer, and of every man, in the most cheerful manner, with a shake of the hand, as if they already knew that their fate was doomed; and one and another, as they parted over the side to take their post on board the ketch, might be heard, in their own peculiar manner to cry out, "I say, Sam Jones, I leave you my blue jacket and duck trousers, stowed away in my bag!" and, "Bill Curtis, you may have the turpentine box, and Guernsey frock, and them petticoat trousers that I got in Malta,—and mind, boys, when you get home, give a good account of us!" In like manner did each, thus make his oral will, to which the writer was witness, and which "last will and testament" he caused to be executed to the very letter.

It was about nine o'clock, on the night of the 4th of September, 1804, that this third and last attempt was made. The Nautilus had been ordered to follow the Intrepid closely in, to pick up and bring out her boat's crew, in case they should succeed in the exploit. Hence, though it was very dark, we never lost sight of her, as I had been directed, by the first Lieutenant the late gallant Washington Reed—who commanded in the absence of Somers, to keep constant watch of her for this purpose, with a night glass.

At the end of an hour, about 10 o'clock, P. M. while I was engaged in this duty, the awful explosion took place. For a moment the flash illuminated the whole harbor around, while the terrific concussion shook every thing far and near. Then all was hushed again, and every object veiled in a darkness of double gloom. On board the Nautilus, the silence of death seemed to pervade the entire crew; but, quickly the din of kettle drums, beating to arms, with the noise of confusion and alarm, was heard from the inhabitants on shore. To aid in the escape of the boats, an order was issued to fire a gun, "about a light"—upon the appearance of which, hundreds of shot, from an equal number of guns, of heavy calibre, from the batteries near, came over and around us. But we needed them not: one thought and one feeling had possession of our souls—the preservation of Somers and his crew!

As moment after moment passed by, without bringing with it the preconcerted signal of the boat, the anxiety on board became intense: and the men with lighted lanterns, hung themselves over the sides of the vessel, till their heads almost touched the water,—a position, in which an object, on its surface, can be seen farthest on a dark night—with the hope of discovering something which would give assurance of its safety. Still no boat came, and no signal was given; and the unwelcome conclusion was at last forced upon us, that the fearful alternative—of blowing themselves up rather than be captured—so bravely determined upon, at the outset of the enterprise, had been so bravely put in execution. The fact, that the Intrepid, at the time of the explosion, had not proceeded so far into the harbor, by several hundred yards, as it was the intention of Somers to carry her, before setting fire to her fire, confirmed us in this apprehension; still, we lingered on the spot till broad day light—though we lingered in vain—in the hope that some one, at least, of the number, might yet be rescued, by us, from a floating plank or spar, to tell the tale of his companion's fate.

To our astonishment, we learned next day, that Lieut. Israel, a gallant youth, who had been sent with orders from Commodore Preble to Somers, after he was under way in the ketch, had accompanied him in the expedition, and had met the same fate.

Such was the end of the noble fellows, who, a few days only before, on board their own gun-boat, No. 1, had beaten six of the enemy's fleet, of equal force with themselves, immediately under the guns of the town, and within a pistol shot of a shore battery; an achievement accomplished only, in their peculiar position, by backing astern, and keeping up an incessant fire of canvass bags, filled with musket balls and slugs. Our gallant Commodore in the "Constitution," stood in to take the fire of the battery, and thus enable us, without his consent, to obey the order, "to come out of action"—a signal which then had been given, for more than an hour, and which Somers, at first would not, and at last, (from the fierceness of the fight,) could not see.—Naval Magazine for March.

The following beautiful extract is taken from the "Tales of a physician," a work recently republished in this country:

"There is scarcely a profession in which the sympathies of its professors are more painfully excited by the sufferings of others than that of medical practitioner.—How often is he called to the bed of hopeless sickness; and that too, in a family, the members of which are drawn together by the closest bonds of love! How painful is it to witness the imploring gaze of affected friends, or even the indifference of early, gaiety, &c. Also, to refuse the many with interest, of the hands so eagerly held out for medicine.

They will remain in the city for a few weeks, with the view of accomplishing an arrangement for the tract, having already applications for large portions. Those desirous to secure the opportunity, will please signify their intention, by calling at No. 242 Market street, between 7th and 8th, where any information desired will be given, together with the most satisfactory references, will be given.

Patent Double Focus, SPECTACLE GLASSES

L. SCHNAITMAN.

RESPECTFULLY returns thanks to his friends and the public in general, for past favors, and begs a continuance of the encouragement, and also to inform them that he has removed to manufacture, and keeps constantly on hand, a general assortment of spectacles, suited to every eyesight, of good quality and price. He would particularly call the attention of persons who have been in the habit of using Spectacles, which are adapted to seeing far and near with the same glass.

What, heretofore, was only obtained by having half glasses set, each one for the place, which gave a difference in the thickness, and also in the material composing each, which is evidently injurious to the eye, is in the Patent Double Focus Glasses, obtained with one glass, which is better in appearance, and also in the eye, and so as to be full and equal throughout, which is a great improvement.

A further description of the glasses is deemed unnecessary as they can be seen at his store, No. 242 Market St. 8th north Second street, or at the store of Morgan, Wolff & Wrigglesworth, 4th south Second street, Philadelphia, who are the only authorized agents for the patent glasses in the city of Philadelphia, and in all other places.

By the aid of improved machinery, I am now enabled to supply the trade with Double Focus Glasses, at a much lower rate.

Also—Gold Lightning Rod Points, constantly on hand.

Cure for Bowel Complaint.

D. LAYNE'S CARMINATIVE BALSAM

is instant remedy for most diseases of the Bowels and Stomach, such as Diarrhea or Looseness, Cholera, Cholera Morbus, Vomiting, Pains in the Stomach and Bowels, Dysentery, &c. and that frequent and fatal scourge among children, intense Cholera Infantum, or Summer Complaint.

It is recommended by a great many physicians, clergymen, and families of the first respectability, who have repeatedly used it in their families, and have given certificates of its efficacy, which may be seen by calling on any of the agents for the sale of the Balsam. The following agents are authorized to sell it: Dodson, Philadelphia, Dr. C. Hammond, Mobile; Dr. L. Lawrence, Natchez, Miss.

Key T. J. Kirby, Trustee 2d Baptist Church, Philada. Rev. William Rogers, Pastor of the Baptist Church, Wrightstown, N. J. Rev. T. J. Hopkins, of Freehold, N. J. Rev. E. Cornelius, Reading, Pa. and a host of others, besides the following:

From Dr. L. M. Knapp, late physician to the Baltimore Dispensary, Professor of Chemistry, &c. &c.

Baltimore, March 27th, 1833.

Dr. Layne—Dear Sir,—I have now sold a dozen bottles of the efficacy of your medicine. I can safely say that I never sold any medicine that gave more general satisfaction, and so much satisfaction, and my patients so soundly and perfect recovered. The Wheeler's succeeded into a family, of which I am a member of a very delicate constitution, and it is called for again. I can say, which I think I ought to say, that I have used your Balsam in the Summer Complaints of children, it has invariably succeeded in a cure, when all other means failed. I did not fear to give it to the little infant, when I was in Philadelphia. I have found the effects of it, and such a child, I have time and again seen it act like a charm, and give immediate relief in a few minutes. In fine, it is a valuable medicine, and a benefit to mankind.—Yours, &c. &c.

M. L. KNAPP, M.D.

From Dr. Williams, Baltimore.

This may certify, that I have used Dr. Layne's Carminative Balsam, in my family for many years, and have not found a better benefaction in declining it superior to any preparation that have come under my notice.

Comly's Spelling Book Improved.

HAVING from time to time received Comly's Spelling Book, with the improvements and alterations suggested by many of the most eminent and extensive teachers throughout the Union, we have now published an edition of it, printed from stereotype plates, and so fixed, as to retain the form of the 3d A Familiar Introduction to English Grammar on the Inductive System, designed to render the study easy and pleasant, and to exhibit the beauties of the language.

In other respects this edition corresponds, and is printed page for page with the last edition, so as to be perfectly uniform in size, without the inconvenience that always results from altering the arrangement of the order.

We will continue to publish an hereafter an edition of Comly's Spelling Book, on the old plan, for those who prefer it, which may also be had separate from the Spelling Book.
